TO

EARL HARCOURT.

MY LORD,

SLENDER as my pretensions are to the public favor, I have the greater reason to shelter myself under a distinguished patronage.

YOUR Lordship's sanction of my labors will be a powerful recommendation ; the true taste which you

you are well known to possess in the fine arts, and to which you have contributed so many elegant specimens, emboldens me, however otherwise diffident ; and prompts me to hope that my attempt may not prove altogether unworthy of the public eye.

AMIDST the many elegant scenes displayed on the banks of the river Thames, few are more deservedly celebrated than those which your Lordship enjoys ; and which receive additional recommendation from the condescension with which they are rendered accessible.

PLAIN and unadorned language, raised scarce above the style of common narrative, may, perhaps, fall short of the dignity of the subject; but to have aimed at one more luxuriant, by blending the simplicity of prose with the fanciful ornaments of poetic diction, would have been still farther remote from the true province of this work, which, professing to hold up the most faithful mirror to nature, takes as little licence with the pencil as the pen.

I FLATTER myself, your Lordship will not disapprove the frequent references to antiquity. The subject, rich as it is, would have wanted

wanted interest without them; and your partiality to that source of information will besides give farther sanction to my pursuit.

I have the Honor,

MY LORD,

To subscribe myself,

With great Respect,

YOUR LORDSHIP'S

Very obliged and obedient Servant,

SAM^L. IRELAND.

PRE-

P R E F A C E.

ENCOURAGED by the very favorable reception which the public has given to a Picturesque Illustration of a Tour on the Continent, the author of this work has been induced to gratify a wish long since formed, of attempting to display the rich scenery of his own country, a country where nature and art are so happily combined, as to adorn and fertilize even its remotest parts,

parts, and to have not only afforded the means of happiness, but added luxury to the enjoyments of a great people.

UPON entering into such a discussion, the object that naturally first engages our attention is the river Thames, a scene of industry, and a source of opulence, to which we owe so much both in convenience, salubrity, and every relative blessing that can add to the greatness of the first commercial city in the world.—Indeed it is rather matter of surprise, amidst the numerous publications on the subject of picturesque scenery, which have lately employed the pen and pencil of our writers and artists, that so leading and capital a feature

in

in landscape should not have caught the eye, and have pre-occupied the powers of some one, perhaps, better skilled in description, though not less ardent in admiration of its picturesque beauties.

IN illustrating the present pursuit, the bridges are certainly the principle objects, and from their number will naturally exclude that variety of scenery, which would otherwise more fully have diversified the subject. Such other views, however, as are introduced, have been selected as the best suited to characterise the face of the country. They are all from the pencil of the author ; (except the view of Strawberry-hill, which is from a drawing given to him seven or eight years ago, by his late valuable friend Francis Grose): the principal part of them were taken in the summer of 1790, the others from sketches made several years since, when the idea of this work first suggested itself, in consequence of frequent excursions on this noble river.

IN the descriptive part he has aimed at a plain and simple style of narrative, and rejected the technical phraseology of art, judging that

“ Unerring Nature, still divinely bright,
 “ One clear, unchang’d and universal light;
 “ Life, force, and beauty, must to all impart,
 “ At one the source, and end, and test of art.”

IN

IN the historic parts little more could be done, than to endeavour at a judicious selection of such passages from the learned as appeared best calculated to give information ; and in this, as far as the compass of his work would admit, he is willing to hope he has been in some degree successful.

The engravings are executed by the same artist who was engaged in the former work, and the writer flatters himself equally merit a claim to the public approbation.

THE superior excellence of the figure of Thames, at the entrance to Somersfet-place, which was modelled by John Bacon, Esq.

R. A.

R. A. is a work of such superior excellence, as to render any apology for its introduction here as a frontispiece, unnecessary.

THE maps annexed to these volumes are added merely to display the course of the river, not as correct geographical delineations of the counties through which it passes.

Course of the RIVER THAMES from its SOURCE to Maidenhead bridge.

Pictureſque Views

ON THE RIVER THAMES, &c.

SECTION I.

THE ſource of the Thames, this firſt of Britiſh rivers, is derived from a copious ſpring, called Thames Head, near the village of Tarlton, about two miles ſouth-weſt of Cirenceſter, and is contiguous to the poſſe-way leading to Somerſetſhire. Though I could have wiſhed to have introduced into this work, a view of the ſource itſelf, I have yet thought fit to exhibit an adjoining ſpot in preference, as forming a better object for the pencil.*

SOME writers have asserted, that the source of this river is in the neighbourhood of Cobberly, in Gloucestershire, at a place called Seven-Wells Head; but as the former opinion is most prevalent, I shall date the present enquiry from thence.

THE name also of this river has long been matter of controversy, even amongst the learned, on whom we ought to rely; it therefore becomes necessary previously to investigate the various opinions and authorities that have been advanced on the subject. The vulgar appellation it bears above Oxford is Thame-Isis, evidently formed from a combination of the words Thame and Isis; the supposed conflux of which gave rise to a poem of some eminence, called “ The Marriage of Thame and Isis.” How this river obtained the latter name, or at what period, I cannot learn: Stow seems to concur in this poetical fiction, and deems every one ignorant who gives the river any other appellation than that of Isis; but to shew that no great reliance is to be placed on his opinion, I will use his own words, which are so flatly contradictory to themselves as to invalidate his authority: he says, in the fifth chapter of his Survey of London, that “ the Thames beginneth a little above a village called Winchcomb in Oxfordshire, and still increaseth, passeth first by the university of Oxford, &c. to London;” and in the next chapter, that the Isis “ goeth unto Thame in Oxfordshire,” (which is more than fifteen miles below Oxford) “ where joining with

* THE engine with sails, which appears in the annexed view, raises water from the head, and by its mechanical power, throws up several tons of water every minute, supplying the Thames and Severn canal.

“ a river of the same denomination, it loseth
 “ the name of Ifis or Ouse, and from thence
 “ is called Thamefis all along as it passeth.”
 As Master Stow, therefore, does not seem to understand himself, I must, to clear up this disputed point, refer to Camden, on whose authority I am inclined to rely. He says, “ it plainly appears, that the river was al“ ways called Thames, or Tems, before it “ came near the (town of) Thame;” and that in several ancient “ charters, granted “ to the abbey of Malmesbury, as well as “ that of Eneſham; and from the old deeds “ relating to Cricklade,” it is never conſi-dered under any other name, than that of Thames. To prove this assertion, he instances, that “ in an ancient charter granted
 “ to abbot Adhelm, there is mention made “ of certain lands upon the east part of the “ river,—cujus vocabulum TEMIS, juxta “ vadum qui appellatur Summerford; and “ this ford is in Wiltshire.” He likewise says,

says, it no where occurs under the name of Ifis.

ALL historians, who mention the incursions of Ethelwold into Wiltshire, A. D. 905, or of Canute, in 1016, concur likewise in the same opinion, by declaring, “ that they passed over the THAMES at Cricklade.”—There is still further reason for confiding in these authorities, as it is not probable, that the THAMES HEAD, an appellation by which the source has usually been distinguished, should give birth to a river of the name of Ifis, which river, after having run half its course, should reassume the name of Thames, the appellation of its parent spring.

As to the origin of its name, it may possibly be derived from the Saxon Temere, or from the British word Tavuys, which implies a gentle stream, and from which many rivers in this island derive their appellation;

as Tame in Staffordshire, Teme in Herefordshire, Tamar in Cornwall, &c.

HAVING thus briefly, and from the best authority adducible, endeavoured to establish the name of the river which is the present subject of discussion, I flatter myself, I shall avoid the imputation of blending the history of two rivers, where I mean only to treat of one—the THAMES.

THE great supply of water, that swells the early course of this river, the Thames Head, is occasioned by the first heavy fall of snow and rain in the winter season, from different parts of the wolds or hills in Gloucestershire ; which, pouring into the vallies beneath, unites with the springs in Kemble Vale, contiguous to the Thames Head.

THE village of Kemble, from which this vale takes its name, is finely situated on an eminence, eminence, and commands a rich extent of scenery, happily diversified by the easy winding of the stream, which terminates in a faint view of the Oxfordshire hills.

ABOUT a mile below the source of the river is the first mill constructed for grinding corn, which is called Kemble mill ; near which the stream receives considerable accession from several springs issuing out of the eastern side of the wolds, as well as others that flow from Ash coppice, and the vicinity of Somerford ; at which place the river may properly be said to form a constant current ; which, though not more than nine feet wide in the summer months, yet in the winter season becomes such a torrent as to overflow the neighbouring meadows for many miles around ;

“ When the calm river, rais’d with sudden rains,
 “ Or snows dissolv’d, o’erflows th’ adjoining plains.”

IN the summer months, the Thames Head is so perfectly dry, as to appear no other than a large dell, interspersed with stones and weeds.

FROM Somerford the stream gently winds its course to the village of Ashton Keynes, and thence to the town of Cricklade, where being united with the river Churn from Cirencester, and other streams from Malmesbury, Barnesly, and the Eastern side of Wiltshire, they form unitedly a river sufficient for the navigation of boats of about seven tons burthen.

SECTION II.

THE new canal, formed by the junction of the Thames and Severn navigation, is an object so nearly connected, as not to be thought irrelevant to the present enquiry ; and at the same time, of such importance, as to warrant the introduction of it.

THIS canal may be considered as the most elaborate and stupendous work of art that, perhaps, any country, has yet accomplished; in uniting two of the noblest rivers in this kingdom. A project was formed more than a century ago to join these rivers, and a survey made by Joseph Moxon, hydrographer to King Charles II. to prove its practicability. The idea is likewise suggested by Mr. Pope, in a letter to the Honorable Mr. Digby, dated

1722, which, as it is written with a strong poetic and lively imagination, I shall give in his own words :—" I could pass whole days
 " in only describing the future, and as yet
 " visionary, beauties that are to rise in
 " those scenes (in Lord Bathurst's woods,
 " at Cirencester) the palace that is to be
 " built, the pavilions that are to glitter,
 " the colonades that are to adorn them ;
 " nay more, the meeting of the Thames
 " and Severn, which (when the noble owner
 " has finer dreams than ordinary) are to be
 " led into each others embraces, through " secret caverns of not above twelve or
 " fifteen miles, till they rise and celebrate
 " their marriage in the midst of an im" mense amphitheatre, which is to be the " admiration of posterity a hundred years
 " hence : but till this destined time shall
 " arrive, that is to manifest those wonders,
 " Mrs. Digby must content herself with seeing

“ ing what is at present no more than the “ finest wood in England.”

THAT once distant period is now arrived, and the happy junction accomplished, under the survey of an able engineer, Mr. Robert Whitworth, in 1782. It may not be improper to mention, that a canal was formed by act of parliament, in 1730, from the Severn to Wallbridge, near Stroud, at which place the present work commences : The new canal ascends by Stroud, through the vale of Chalford, to the height of three hundred and forty-three feet, by means of twenty-eight locks, and from thence to the entrance of the tunnel near Sapperton, a distance of about seven miles three furlongs. The canal is forty-two feet in width at top, and thirty at the bottom ; proper warehouses are constructed on its banks for the reception of merchandize from the Severn vessels, and convenience of lading the navigation barges. The canal is continued by a subterraneous passage or tunnel, excavated beneath Sapperton hill, and under that part of Lord Bathurst's grounds called Haley wood, making a distance of two miles and three furlongs.

THE tunnel, the entrance to which is the subject of the view annexed to this section, is near fifteen feet in width, and has sufficient depth of water to navigate barges from sixty to seventy tons burthen ; these barges are about eighty feet in length, twelve in width, and draw about four feet of water when loaded ; hence the canal descending one hundred and thirty-four feet, by fourteen locks, joins the Thames at Lechlade, a distance of about twenty miles and two furlongs.

THIS work has been achieved, with immense labor and perseverance, out of a loose rock

rock of lime and stone ; and, to secure the water, it is lined throughout with well-tempered clay. Over this canal are many handsome bridges of single arches, particularly that at Thames Head, (as described in the view prefixed to the first section,) from whence this canal receives a considerable body of water, as well as at Cirencester, where it is again supplied from the river Churn. Near the south west side of the town of Cirencester a large basin is constructed, with wharfs and warehouses for the convenience of this navigation. The basin is supplied with water by an aqueduct formed under Lord Bathurst's pleasure grounds, which are before his house.

THE length of the canal from the Severn at Froamlade to Ingleham, where it joins the river Thames, is more than thirty miles ; the expence of which has considerably exceeded the sum of two hundred thousand pounds, pounds, three thousand of which, I am credibly informed by a principal proprietor, have been expended in the gun-powder alone, used for the purpose of blowing up the rock.

THIS immense work was completed on the 14th of November, 1789, within a period of less than seven years from its commencement. Nor is it an easy task to describe the various advantages that seem likely to be derived from its extensive communication with the different parts of Wales, Bristol, Gloucester, Shrewsbury, &c. ; its more inland navigation, as connected with the canals of Staffordshire and Worcestershire, and its immediate intercourse with the Thames from Lechlade towards Oxford, Wallingford, &c. to London : so various, and so important, are the benefits derived from hence, both to the individual and the public, the inhabitant who receives with little

little expence the produce of the most distant quarter of the island delivered at his own door, and the traveller who passes smoothly and securely by it through roads no longer cut to pieces with heavy carriages, that it is much to be wished this work may prove as beneficial to the spirited and enterprising proprietors, as it is a blessing to more than the countries through which it passes.

THE course of this canal having brought me to Earl Bathurst's grounds, so highly famed for their many beauties in point of natural situation, as well as artificial culture; I should deem myself deficient in observation were I to pass them unnoticed. This extensive park is more than twelve miles in circumference; and is intersected by four grand vistas, each of which forms a happy termination of extensive scenery. Approaching the house, the view towards Cirencester

Cirencester combines a fine assemblage of buildings, not amusing only, but very striking to the imagination at first sight; yet the tower of a Gothic church rising so immediately over a modern mansion, and seeming to form a part of it, upon a more deliberate view presents to the mind rather an heterogeneous mass, or accidental form of beauty, than such a correct model, as would be proper to record by the pencil. It seems incongruous as the fabulous centaur, or as

“ Humano capiti cervicem pictor equinam
 “ Jungere si velit.”

IN passing these grounds, the mind naturally reverts to that Augustan period, in which some of the brightest literary characters that ever at any one time adorned this country, gave additional splendor to this enchanting spot.

“ These scenes could Addison’s chaste notes inspire :

“ Here Pope harmonious struck his silver lyre,

“ Caught

“ Caught ’midst these solemn shades the glorious plan,
 “ To vindicate the ways of God to man.
 “ Arbuthnot here, and Swift, with useful art, “ Rear’d Satire’s dreaded scourge, or steel’d her dart.
 “ Here, Prior, the Graces form’d thy foster lay;
 “ And taught the moral strains to blameless Gay.
 “ Each pleas’d the master’s praises to engage,
 “ The fam’d Mæcenæ of that happier age !”

PYE’s Farringdon Hill.

THE table on which the immortal Pope once reclined, I am informed, has since quitted the service of the Muses, and is now removed to a common alehouse in the neighbourhood.

THE town of Cirencester is famed for its antiquity, many evident marks of which are still remaining to prove it was formerly a Roman station, and the fragments of the old walls evince it to have been a place of considerable defence, and in size not inferior to any town in the county.

As it was not the intention to confine

VOL. I.

myself entirely to a description of picturesque objects on the banks of the Thames, I shall digress a little for the sake of mentioning some superior works of art, which I found at Badminton, the seat of the duke of Beaufort, in my route to Bath; the excellence of some, and the rare preservation of others (particularly the gallery of portraits) render them highly meriting the notice of the antiquary and admirer of the arts. Among the portraits, that of John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III. is a fine specimen of painting at that early period. The armour in particular is finished with exquisite precision, richly embossed with gold, and has more the air of a splendid birth-day suit, than a covering for defence in battle. The portrait, likewise, of his eldest son, the duke of Beaufort, is not inferior to the former.

IN this collection is the famous satirical

picture of Fortune, by Salvator Rosa, mentioned in Bernardo Dominici's lives of the Neapolitan artists. It was painted while he was at Rome, and there publicly exhibited at the feast of St. John, to the great mortification of his brother artists. This picture is coloured in his best manner, and replete with satire, in which the church has no small share.

THE writings of this great artist were in equal estimation with his pictures, and from their pointed satirical allusions, drew forth an equal number of enemies. For one of them, he was driven into exile; and there is an excellent portrait of him by himself, in this collection, drawn with a scroll of paper in his hand, said to be the satire for which he was banished.

HERE is likewise a beautiful portrait of that exquisite artist, Guido, from his own

pencil in a large high-crowned hat and black drapery ; and one of Cornelius Janfon, by himself, in a fingular attitude, with the two fore-fingers of the right hand in an upright posture. I mention these pictures, as well for their great excellence, as that it may be a means of procuring prints from them, which I do not remember to have seen. Several pictures by Berchem, Teniers, &c. will be found to merit the highest encomium.

THE cartoon in the chapel, painted in chiaro oscuro, is certainly the work of a great master. The subject is the Transfiguration. It is said to be by the hand of Raphael, and, at his interment, to have been selected from his other works, and carried on his bier ; but I suspect this not to have been the fact, as it is most probable the finished picture at Rome would have obtained that fingular honor.

THIS

THIS cartoon is in size about eleven feet by nine, and seems to have been originally much larger ; it has suffered greatly by time.

THAT this work was not added to the cartoons in the royal collection, is a circumstance much to be lamented ; an offer of three thousand pounds is reported to have been made for that purpose, but refused by its noble owner.

RETURNING towards Cirencester, I cannot avoid mentioning the church at Tetbury, a modern structure recently finished from a plan of Mr. Hiorne, of Warwick, which for taste and simplicity in the Gothic, without redundancy of parts, is the happiest selection I remember to have any where seen.

SECTION III.

HAVING, in the first section, aimed at a brief account of the course of the Thames from its source to the town of Cricklade, I shall resume the subject at that place, the name of which has given rise to much controversy.

A GREEK school was anciently founded here, or rather restored, by the learned archbishop of Canterbury, Theodorus, and afterwards translated to Oxford; from this school the name of Greeklade is said to have been given to the town: but Camden thinks, and with more probability, that it derives its appellation from the British Cerigwlâd, i. e. a stoney country, which epithet well agrees with the nature of its soil.

THE town was formerly of much repute; at present neither the derivation of its name, or its former consequence, entitle it to much notice; it being only remarkable for a very large parish church—for the mode by which they convey their dead to interment, (which is by fastening the coffin on the front of a post-chaise)—and for the provision, which, while they had the power, they were accustomed to make for the living, by a more high-priced, than constitutional, estimate of their borough franchises.

AT Cricklade we found the stream so shallow, as not to be in many places more than fourteen inches deep, and so overgrown with weeds, as to be rendered scarcely navigable even for the smallest fishing-boat.

IN pursuing the course of the stream, about a mile below this town, we find the first bridge, which is constructed of wood, with a hand-

a hand-rail merely for the safety of foot-passengers. The sketch of it annexed to this section, may serve to point out the humble state of this noble river and its appendages near its source, as contrasted with its more expanded course and magnificent decorations as it approaches the capital, where

“ With rapid course it seeks the sacred main,

“ And fattens, as it runs, the fruitful plain.”

FROM this wooden bridge, which is called Eifey bridge, the town of Cricklade forms a pleasing termination of prospect across the intervening meadows, which though flat, and rather uninteresting, are happily relieved and intersected by the winding current of the stream. Below Water Eaton, there is little variation of prospect, till we reach Castle Eaton, where there is a small bridge and water-mill, so pleasingly combined with other objects of rural and unaffected scenery, as to render them worthy the pencil of the first artist.

APPROACHING Kempford, a large village in Gloucestershire, the river quits Wiltshire, and again enters its native county, dividing it from Berkshire at Ingleham, where the scenery is greatly improved, by the combination of an ancient Gothic church, with its usual appendage, a comfortable vicarage-house: these are pleasantly situated on a verdant slope, rising from the margin of the Thames, which, though shallow, is yet beautifully transparent, and, as it ripples in its course, displays a sheltered and gravelly bed, where the neighbouring cattle luxuriantly bask themselves in the noon-tide sun. Within this pleasant retreat the Vicarage, we found, not the vicar, but his locum tenens, an humble Welch curate, with a wife and two children, existing on twenty-five

five pounds a year, and honestly confessing he had, on this side the grave, no wish beyond the addition of ten pounds to his salary ; and could he have obtained this, he might have said with Swift

——— “ These things in my possessing,
“ Are better than the bishop’s blessing.”

Surely if the wish of this honest curate be sincere, and his morals equal to his simplicity, he cannot fall very short of the character of a primitive christian.

ADJOINING to the church, which is a venerable old structure, there lately stood a very extensive mansion-house, once occupied by John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster. He resided here for some time, but taking a dislike to the place, on account of the unfortunate death of his only son (which happened here) he granted the manor of Kenemeres, Kenemeresford, or Kempsford, with other lands, to the collegiate church of St. Mary the Less, in the castle of Leicester, for the maintenance of an hospital called Newark, or New Work, of which he was the founder, 28 of Ed. III.

WITHIN the tower of the church, on the capitals of the pillars, are the arms of this duke, of the earl of Gloucester, and of king Alfred; and on the outside of the church door is nailed a large horse-shoe, said to have belonged to Henry IV. This ancient mansion has, by order of its possessor, lord Colmaine, been levelled to the ground, within the last six years, when the materials were purchased by ——— Loveden, Esq; of Burcott Park, with which he has erected an elegant modern house.

THE out-offices and grand entrance to this extensive building are yet standing, and are occupied as farm-houses.

ABOUT

ABOUT three miles from this village is situated the town of Fairford, rendered famous by its church and painted windows. Its founder, John Tame, was a considerable merchant, and in the fifteenth century commanded a large vessel, in which he captured a Spanish ship bound for Rome. The cargo, among other valuables, consisted of a great quantity of painted glafs, intended for his holiness the pope; this part of the prize he brought to his patrimonial estate, where he erected the church, a handsome structure, purposely to deposit these paintings, which consist of twenty-eight in number, and are intended to illustrate some striking passages in the Old and New Testament. They are handed down to us as the works of Albert Durer, which, contrary to the received opinion, I by no means credit. The original designs may possibly have been by him; if so, much of their excellence has been lost by their being copied on the glafs, as in point of drawing they are very defective. The figures of the prophets are in every respect, in my estimation, by much the best part of the work. On the whole, though there is much clearness and brilliancy in the colouring, yet they are much inferior to what I expected, from the high eulogiums I had often heard on their merit.
of

THE river from Kempsford increases considerably in width as it approaches the town of Lechlade, a distance of about six miles, in which course are several weirs, and one large wooden bridge at Hannington, from whence Highworth church and village appear in the distance, forming a pleasing object.

ABOUT three miles below Hannington is Inglesham, where the Severn canal unites with the Thames, which is there considerably improved, by being cleared of its weeds and other impediments to navigation, through
the

the attention of the public-spirited proprietors in this undertaking.

LECHLADE is a large town in Gloucestershire, situated on the confines of Berkshire and Oxfordshire. The ground on which it stands was formerly called the Lade, from which appellation, conjoined with that of the contiguous river Lech, it derives its compound name, Lechlade. That river here empties itself into the Thames, which, at this place, is so much increased by the junction of the rivers Colne and Churn, as to be capable of navigating vessels from ninety to an hundred tons burthen.

IN a meadow, near Lechlade, was lately discovered a large subterraneous building, supposed to have been a Roman bath ; it is near fifty feet in length, forty in breadth, and four feet in height ; and is supported by pillars

pillars of brick, and curiously inlaid with stones of variegated colours.

IN the lower church-yard, at Cricklade, is a curious ancient cross, of which, though I have not been able to procure the history, the annexed sketch will give some idea.

SECTION IV.

THE river, from Lechlade, though considerably improved, has yet required the assistance of art to aid its navigation; a spacious cut, therefore, has been formed for that purpose, a little below the town, which runs nearly parallel with the old river, and contiguous to St. John's Bridge. A handsome arch is thrown across this new cut, which with the old structure adjoining, forms no unpleasing object; the spire of Lechlade Church appearing over the bridge, and the singular circumstance of two navigable streams coming so nearly in contact, so highly enrich the scenery, as not to be overlooked by the eye of the picturesque traveller.

THE old bridge is of great strength and antiquity; but I have not been able to procure any information of the period in which it was built.

ABOUT half a mile below the bridge, is the village of Burfcott, on the confines of Berkshire, near which is a new lock and pound, juſt finiſhed, which has the appearance of being well conſtructed, both for convenience, and diſpatch of buſineſs. On an eminence, at ſome diſtance, is Burfcott Park; in which is erected the manſion of Mr. Loveden, from the remains of Kempsford houſe, as mentioned in the laſt ſection: the mere value of the lead found on this houſe amounted to five hundred pounds, for which ſum the whole of the materials were purchaſed.

MR. LOVEDEN has added greatly to the beauty of his ſituation, by introducing into his park, at a conſiderable expence, a ſmall canal, from the body of the river, which the constant

constant attention of that gentleman has also considerably improved, by means of embankments, and the removal of various obstructions. The growth, however, of the weeds with which it is over-run, though unpleasant to the eye, and an impediment to the navigation, is certainly the means of preserving many of its finny inhabitants from the ravage of the poacher. The increase of weeds, it must likewise be observed, serves to restrain the current, and thereby keep up a greater body of water: their growth, as well as that of all subaqueous plants, is well known to have an increase proportionate to that of vegetation in the open air, after a shower of rain.

REMARKING that all the watermen, and persons concerned in the navigation, have an idea, and boldly assert, that the river, in this vicinity, freezes first at the bottom; and that they frequently find icicles and con-

gelations adhering to the keels and bottoms of their boats, when there is no appearance of ice on the surface; and feeling myself not satisfied with this trite and vulgar opinion, I am induced to refer for a more philosophical and convincing proof of the assertion; when in Dr. Plott I find the following observation:—"That the watermen
 " frequently meet the ice-meers, or cakes
 " of ice, in their rise, and sometimes in the " under-side including stones and gravel,
 " brought with them ab imo;" and he observes, "it is consonant to reason, for that
 " congelations come from the conflux of
 " salts, before dispersed at large, is as plain
 " as the vulgar experiment of freezing a pot
 " by the fire; and that induration and
 " weight come also from thence, sufficiently
 " appears from the great quantities of them
 " that are always found in stones, bones,
 " testaceous, and all other weighty bodies." He likewise seems to credit the assertion of a person

a person who once saw a hatchet casually fall overboard into the river, near Wallingford, which was afterwards brought up and found in one of these ice-meers.—As my author sometimes deals in the marvellous, I shall forbear any comment on these observations.

THE scenery in this vicinity corresponds with the neglected state of the river, being flat, and very uninteresting, till by various windings of the stream, the distance expands, and a pleasing view of Farringdon Hill presents itself, which with the various easy slopes of the neighbouring hills, aided by the villages of Eaton on the right, and Kempscott on the Oxfordshire side of the river, happily relieve the eye, and convey no unpleasing idea to the admirers of the native beauties of English landscape.

SECTION V.

RADCOTE Bridge next presents itself to view ; it is the oldest structure we have yet passed ; but respecting the period in which it was raised, the common sources of information have failed.

FROM authentic accounts it appears, that a causeway was certainly begun in the neighbourhood, as early as William the Conqueror, most probably by Robert D'Oyley, who came over with him, and was a very distinguished man in his day ; he built Oxford Castle, and appears to have been concerned in another work of the same kind, leading from Friar Bacon's study, at Oxford.

THIS bridge and its vicinity are rendered famous by a considerable battle fought in
the

the reign of Richard II. an. 1387, between his highly honored favorite Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, Marquis of Dublin, and Duke of Ireland, and the discontented barons, among whom were Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Derby, Warwick, &c. in which the troops of the favorite were routed, and he, by swimming across the river, effected his escape. In the poem of Thame and Isis the fact is thus recorded :

“ Here Oxford’s hero, famous for his boar——
 “ While clashing swords upon his target sound,
 “ And show’rs of arrows from his breast rebound, “ Prepar’d for worst of fates, undaunted stood,
 “ And urg’d his beast into the rapid flood:
 “ The waves in triumph bore him, and were proud
 “ To sink beneath their honourable load.”

AFTER this defeat he fled the realm, and died in banishment, at Louvain, about five years afterwards, as it is said, in consequence of a wound received from the tusks of a boar, boar, in the chace of that animal ; his body was, three years after his death, brought to England by order of the king, and at his expence, was with great solemnity interred at Colne, in Effex. The family crest of the Veres, Earls of Oxford, was a boar.

ABOUT a mile distant from the bridge, is Farringdon Hill, a beautiful eminence, which is terminated by a small grove seen at a considerable distance, from the different points, in the various windings of the river ; it derives its name from the neighbouring town of Farringdon, and rises with an easy ascent from the vale of White Horse, beneath ; which vale takes its name from the supposed figure of a white horse in chalk, which, if ever it had reality, is probably much restored by the custom of weeding it at stated periods ; the popular opinion runs, that it was formed in commemoration of a victory obtained by Alfred over the Danes ;

by others it is said to have been marked out by Hengist, who certainly bore on his standard the figure of a white horse; something of this kind is still to be seen in Dorsetshire, near Dorchester, representing the figure of a giant and his club.

THE hill commands an extensive and richly diversified scene, spreading over part of Berkshire, Oxfordshire, Gloucestershire, and Wiltshire, as well as of the valley beneath. Between Radcote Bridge and Farringdon Hill stands an elegant house, built by Henry James Pye, Esq. the present laureate, (now occupied by Mr. Hallet): the spot is happily chosen, and he has celebrated its beauties in a poem of much merit. At a small distance from Radcote Bridge runs the canal which leads to Abingdon.

USEFUL to the commerce of the country, and laudable as the enterprize of forming navigable

navigable canals all over the kingdom, must be acknowledged to be, it is still with some regret we view the old stream falling almost into total neglect and disuse. Such, however, in this neighbourhood during the summer months, is the situation of this noble river, which is then shallow in water, and overgrown with oziers and weeds ; its locks and wiers are falling fast into decay ; and in many places we find only a few old timbers remaining, to mark where such aids to navigation were once thought of utility. In the winter season the river, which hereabouts considerably overflows the adjacent meadows, is much augmented by the addition of the Windrush, a large brook, which flowing from the Cotswold hills, enters Oxfordshire near Burford, and passing by Witney, joins the Thames to the south-west of the Evenlode, another river, which, rising near Stow, in the wold in Gloucestershire, likewise falls into the Thames, near Cassington, north-west of Oxfordshire.

OF Burford, Dr. Plott remarks, that within his memory a whimsical ceremony was observed there of making yearly a large dragon, and carrying it up and down the town, with much jollity, on Midsummer eve, to which they added a huge giant of proportionate size. This custom, he conjectures, was to commemorate a victory obtained by the West Saxons over Ethelbald, King of the Mercians, about the year 750, at a place contiguous to the town, still called Battle Edge. On the banner of the Mercian king was depicted a golden dragon.

IT is observed of the river Windrush, that it is of so nitrous a quality, and so impregnated with that absterfive salt, that thence the blanketting, manufactured at Witney, acquires

acquires a degree of whiteness superior to what is made in any other part of the kingdom.

PURSUING the course of the river, on the right appears Buckland, the seat of Sir Robert Throckmorton—a modern structure situated on an eminence. This mansion was built by its present possessor, near the site of the former edifice, part of which still remains. Its situation is truly picturesque, embowered amidst a thicket of stately trees, and commands a most enchanting view of the river beneath, and an extensive distance, which though flat, highly abounds with the richest luxuriance of nature.

THE windings of the river here, in its course, form many pleasing breaks in the landscape; and if the spire of a church, as has been frequently observed, gives a happy termination to village scenery, that of Bampton ton claims peculiar notice, as it is a perpetual object from the river for many miles, both above and below it. The remark made by Charles the Second, on that of Harrow on the Hill, which, from its conspicuous situation, he styled the visible church, will not ill apply to that of Bampton. Approaching the villages of Hinton and Longworth, the Witham Hills, in Oxfordshire, are most happily combined, and so beautifully soften into each other, as to form a distance worthy the pencil of Claude le Lorraine; and it is to be regretted that the noble city of Oxford is so concealed from the eye, as not to lend its aid towards giving a kind of classical finishing to that scenery in nature, which Claude labored so much to perfect from art and imagination.

SECTION VI.

AS we approach towards New Bridge, about four miles farther, the scenery becomes more confined, and the stream much narrower; yet from the immense piers or pointed sterlings, the fall, in the winter months, may be supposed to be amazingly rapid. The bridge is a plain and simple structure, in the Gothic stile, and of great antiquity, but has no appearance of date; it has on one side the letter O. and on the other B. in Roman characters, to denote the division of the counties of Oxford and Berks. The bridge is about two miles from Kingston Inn, in the high road to Witney.

WITH a flat, confined, and rather uninteresting scene, the stream still pursues its humble course towards Bablac Hythe, a little

little below which the face of the country wears a more agreeable aspect ; the river expands, and becomes a clear pellucid stream, beautifully enriched with verdure ; and the grazing cattle on its margin, give a happy idea of that landscape we are accustomed to view on the banks of the Thames, nearer the capital. The majestic remains of Stanton Harcourt, (the ancient seat of the Harcourts,) present a venerable pile of building, at the distance of about two miles, on the Oxfordshire side of the river. On a nearer approach, its consequence is not diminished ; it is continually receiving the fostering aid of its noble possessor ; who, with a knowledge of the modern elegancies of building, and refinements of art, is not unmindful of the precious remains of antiquity. The noble family of the Harcourts, it is well known, are descended from the Harcourts in Normandy, who have been in possession of this mansion for near six hundred years.

The

The first barony was granted to Sir Simon Harcourt, Lord High Chancellor, in the reign of Queen Ann, who obtained this title of Baron Harcourt, of Stanton Harcourt. The earldom was created in 1749. Much of this noble structure was pulled down by the late Earl. The kitchen of this building is of great antiquity, and singularly constructed ; it is a spacious square room ; and though a kitchen without a chimney, beneath the eaves of the roof are shutters contrived to give vent to the smoke. It seems to be the opinion of the learned in antiquity, that the windows, from their form, were inserted about the time of Henry the Fourth. An old writer observes, “ it “ is either a kitchen within a chimney, or a “ kitchen without one.” The inside of the chapel, which is no longer in use, was a private oratory for the family, and remains with its painted and gilded ornaments in the ceiling, in a tolerable state of preservation.

In the great hall, which joined to the chapel, was formerly much stained glass, on which were depicted the different quarterings borne by the Harcourts, and also the portraits and armorial bearings of several persons habited like warriors, who were of this ancient family. This glass has been lately removed, to prevent its destruction.

MR. POPE seems not to have been so good an antiquary as a poet; for in one of his letters he mentions a pane of glass in this apartment, as a valuable antique, which, upon viewing it at Lord Harcourt's house in town, clearly appears to be a forgery, as the character of the letters and figures of the date, "A.^o D^m 1.3.4.7." is evidently more modern. In the tower of this chapel, which is accessible by a winding stair-case, are three apartments; the upper of these is still called Pope's room, from his having occupied it as a study, during a whole summer

mer which he passed in this mansion. Here he finished his translation of the fifth book of the Iliad, which circumstance he has inscribed, with a diamond, on a pane of red glass, carefully preserved by Earl Harcourt; and which he has politely favoured me with the use of, to form from thence a fac simile.

In the year 1718
ALEXANDER POPE
Finished here the Fifth Volume of HOMER

IN the church-yard, on a tablet affixed to the south side of the wall adjoining, is the epitaph written by Pope, on the two lovers, John and Sarah Drew, who were struck dead by lightening in an adjoining field, during the residence of our poet at this place. Here likewise are several very curious monuments, one in the fourth aisle, particularly deserving attention, of a Margaret Byron, wife to Sir Robert Harcourt, who was sent over to Rouen, in Normandy, to receive Margarete of Anjou, Queen of Henry VI. in 1445; and, for the various eminent services rendered to his Sovereign and his country, received the honor of the garter about the year 1463; he is lying in armour, with the mantle of the garter thrown over him; and by him, his lady, who has likewise the mantle of the order, with the garter above the left arm, with the motto,

“ HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE.”

ANNEXED to the end of this section, is a sketch of this lady's figure, from the monument, which, I presume, will not be unacceptable to the admirer of antiquity, as there are but two other instances known of ladies wearing the insignia of the garter; one of which

which is in the church of Ewelme, in this county, of Alice, daughter of Thomas Chaucer, wife to William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk: the other of Constance, daughter of John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, and Duke of Exeter, first married to Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, and after, to Sir John Gray, Knight of the Garter, in the reign of Henry V. and Earl of Tankerville, in Normandy. Her monument is in the church of St. Catherine, near the Tower, but quite defaced.

AT Stanton Harcourt is likewise a handsome monumental figure of Sir Robert Harcourt, who was standard-bearer to Henry VII. at the battle of Bosworth Field; and also Sheriff for the county of Oxford: in the same reign he was made Knight of the Bath, at the creation of Henry, Duke of York, afterwards Henry VIII.

THESE monuments are finely preserved, and have been lately restored with much care ; they are good specimens of the monumental sculpture of the times, as well as the personal decorations and habiliments at that period in use.

SECTION VII.

FROM New Bridge, at the distance of about seven miles, we reach the ancient village of Ensham, near which is an elegant bridge of stone, consisting of three arches, erected about 15 years since, by Lord Abingdon, whose liberality and public spirit have, I am credibly informed, been amply repaid by the revenue derived from this undertaking. The building at the extremity of the bridge was intended for an inn; but, though provided with all proper accommodation and out-buildings, has not proved so fortunate a speculation, having never yet, in any way, been occupied.

The situation of this bridge is truly picturesque; the river considerably expands itself, and beautifully meanders amidst the neigh-

neighbouring meadows, fertile in pasture, and happily screened by the contiguous hills, which form a gentle slope towards its margin. On the Oxfordshire side, the various breaks in the distant scenery, the happy combination of village objects, and tinkling of the distant folds, seem to give an additional beauty and serenity to the landscape, in the minds of those who chance to trace this spot, in the close of a genial summer evening.

THE village of Ensham, whose Gothic tower adorns the neighbouring scene, is a place of great antiquity, and in times as far remote as the charter of King Etheldred, is termed “ a famous place.” A small part of the ruins of the abbey is still remaining: it was endowed, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St. Benedict, about the year 1005. It received considerable benefactions and repairs in the reign of Henry I.; and, at the dissodiffolution of other religious houses, in the year 1539, fell into the rapacious hands of Henry VIII.

“ Who having spent the treasures of his crown,

“ Condemns their luxury to feed his own:—

“ Thus he the church at once protects and spoils;

“ But Princes swords are sharper than their styles.”

THESE remains give but a faint idea of its former extent and magnificence. A singular custom, of very ancient date, is recorded of the royalty of Ensham:—It was a privilege formerly allowed to the town's-people, or, rather to the church, on Whit-Monday—to cut down, and bring away (wherever the churchwardens pleased to mark it out by giving the first chop) as much timber as could be drawn by men's hands into the abbey yard; whence, if they could draw it out again, notwithstanding all the impediments that could be given by the servants of the abbey, it was then their own. It seems a goodly kind of fraud enough, to use the labours and exertions of a whole village, in dragging a supply of fuel, the property of the public, into the abbey, only to make a scramble for the purpose of getting it out again; nor is there reason to suppose that much of it was ever restored to the people of the town, after having once been in the clutches of the good fathers, who, doubtless, were not wanting in ways and means to accomplish what could not be achieved by force; as Prior observes of the lion's skin, which being too short

“ Was lengthen'd by the fox's tail,

“ And art supplied where strength might fail.”

FROM Ensham to Woodstock is a pleasant ride of about four miles; and here, I persuade myself, that the nature of the subject will be thought a sufficient apology for digressing a little from my regular path.

THE varied beauties of nature in its vicinity, aided by a combination of all that is sublime and magnificent in the works of art, naturally call forth the utmost degree of attention from the curious, and may, at least, tend to evince to foreigners, into whose hands this work may fall, that England is as rich in the choicest production of the fine arts, as any other country in Europe; and that Blenheim Castle, first raised as a monument of British gratitude, in reward of British valour, is now equally celebrated as a repository of whatever is splendid and elegant,

SECTION VIII.

FROM Woodstock the grand entrance to Blenheim Castle is through a magnificent triumphal arch, raised to the memory of John, Duke of Marlborough, by Sarah his Duchess. It is from this distance the state-ly pile is most happily viewed; its various towers, rising into the horizon, beautifully break the massy and more ponderous form it wears on a nearer approach. The verdure of the swelling lawn on which it stands, the spacious and easy slope inclining towards the rich valley below, aided by a fine expanse of water, wearing the appearance of a noble river, terminated by a spacious stone bridge (the center arch of which is of superior dimensions to the famed Rialto, at Venice, being a hundred and one feet) with a happy assemblage of rich groves
and

and plantations in the distance, form a beautiful coup d'œil, surpassing any thing I remember to have seen in this or any other country.

THE creation of this lake or river was the work of the famous Brown, who has been heard to boast, “ that the Thames would “ never forgive him for what he had done “ at Blenheim.” He has, at any rate, taken away part of the sting of the following epigram, applied to the first Duke, who erected this bridge :

“ The lofty bridge his high ambition shews,
“ The stream an emblem of his bounty flows.”

THE brevity of the plan on which the present work is conducted, renders it impossible to do justice to the scenery ; but the annexed view may be considered as a faithful hint of the superior excellence of its natural situation. Approaching nearer to this stately pile,

pile, its architectural defects will, to the discriminating eye, become more conspicuous. Neither the taste nor style are such as are reconcilable with the principles of either Vitruvius or Palladio, yet what it wants in elegance is amply atoned for in strength, and that ponderous and massy style, for which it has incurred so much censure, may, from the idea of its durability, at least be tolerated, while it bears lasting testimony, that Vanbrugh built, as Britons fought,

“ Not for an age, but for all time.”

I SHALL forbear further observation on this noble structure, on which so much has been already written, and only remark on the transcendancy of its internal decorations, which combined with so much true judgment and exquisite taste, render it at present, the first assemblage of the works of art in this kingdom.

To

To enumerate all the pictures in this superb collection would be superfluous, to pass them over in silence highly reprehensible. The best works of Rubens, and in the highest preservation, are here selected, with much judgment and princely munificence: among those in the east drawing-room is a Bacchanalian subject, in which the heads of the woman and boys eating grapes exhibit a brilliant specimen of the rich and animated colouring of that great master.

IN the grand cabinet is a picture of Christ blessing the children, in which is introduced the artist's own portrait.

THE Saviour's return from Egypt, and Lot's departure out of Sodom, presented to the Duke by the city of Antwerp, are each highly objects of admiration to the eye of the connoisseur; and of the latter it may be said, that Antwerp, though rich in the works

works of this great master, could not have selected one, by which they could have better testified their respect and veneration.

THE Catherine of Medicis, in black drapery, is a chef d'œuvre in portrait of Rubens; the clear colouring of the head and richness of the satin are both inimitable: and the portraits of the wife and child of this artist, presented to the Duke by the city of Brussels, are still further proofs of his excellence in the art, as well as a testimony borne by the first city in Flanders, to the forbearing hand of the conqueror, who, in the midst of victory, nobly upheld his shield for the protection of the softer elegancies of peace.

I AM happy to observe, amidst the excellent productions of that great master, notwithstanding his rich and brilliant style of colouring, that the works of our English artist, Sir Joshua, lose nothing of their original lustre ; I instance particularly the portrait of Lady Charlotte Spencer, in the character of a gipsy, and the large and beautiful assemblage of portraits in the Marlborough family, both of which seem to bid defiance to the hand of Time, as well as detraction.

IN the grand cabinet is a picture of the Miraculous Conception, in which a beautiful head of the Virgin, encircled with stars, highly merits attention ; it is a capital production of Carlo Dolci.

IN the great drawing-room, famed for its tapestry recording the military exploits of the first Duke, is a pair of beautiful pictures enwreathed with flowers, by Rottenhamer, painted with much sweetness, and in a very superior stile. Some of the best works of Luca Giordano will be found here, particularly larly the capital picture of Seneca bleeding to death, in which we have only to regret the unpleasantness of the subject, which from its superior excellence gives additional pain to the beholder. To particularize each picture, and to describe every bust and elegant decoration, with which this mansion abounds, would be only giving a repetition of what has been said before on the same subject.

FROM every window of the noble library, which occupies the whole of the west front, and is full two hundred feet in length, and indeed from every apartment in the mansion, the picturesque eye is highly gratified, with the richly variegated scenery of pendant groves and waving lawns; of distant columns, proudly bearing record to its noble founder's greatness, and of gardens so luxuriant in nature, and so happily improved by art, as to perfectly accord with each other; nor is the eye offended with that part of the flower-garden from the design of Madame Pompadour, at Versailles, in which, though we find a regularity in the disposition of the parterres, there is yet a superior air of taste in the tout ensemble.

IN the midst of this extensive and elegant scenery, the mind naturally reverts to a ruder period, when all around assumed a solitary state, and majestic pomp.

THE antiquity of Woodstock Park may be ascertained, from its having been a royal residence, as early as the time of King Alfred, who is said, by old writers, to have translated Boetius de Consolatione Philosophiæ, in this place, and who, about the same time, in all probability, founded the university of Oxford.—Camden says, that in the time of King Ethelred, father of Edward the Confessor, it was so considerable a place, that he there held a convention of the states, and enacted

enacted several statutes. In the reign of Henry I. it is conjectured that the park was enclosed by a stone wall, not for deer only, but as a receptacle for foreign animals, such as lions, leopards, camels, lynxes, &c. among which a porcupine is mentioned by William of Malmſbury, of which he ſays “ hiſpidis “ fetis coopertam, quas in canes infectantes “ naturaliter emittunt.”—This extraordinary property of this animal, though correſponding with the vulgar idea at preſent entertained, is, I underſtand, much queſtioned by the more informed naturaliſts of our age.

HENRY II. reſided in this palace, where Malcolm, King of Scotland, and Rice, Prince of Wales, came to pay homage to that Monarch in 1164: and here the honour of knighthood was conferred on Jeffery, ſurnamed Plantagenet, the King's ſecond ſon by the fair Roſamond. The Princeſs Elizabeth was confined in this place a conſiderable able time, by order of her unnatural sister Queen Mary ; in which imprisonment the following lines are said to have been written by her, with charcoal, on the window shutter of the apartment : as I do not recollect they are mentioned by Mr. Walpole, in his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, I shall present them with all their defects to the reader, who may perhaps infer, that she was more distinguished for her politics than her poetry.

“ Oh ! Fortune ! how thy restless wavering state

“ Hath fraught with cares my troubled witt,

“ Witness this present prisoner, whither Fate

“ Could bear me, and the joys I quit.

“ Thou caus'd'st the guiltie to be losed

“ From bands wherein are innocents inclosed,

“ Causing the guiltless to be straites reserved,

“ And freeing those that death well deserved,

“ But by her malice can be nothing wrought,

“ So God fend to my foes all they have thought.”

“ Anno Dom. 1555. ELIZABETH prisoner.”

THE remains of this palace, as it stood in the year 1714, I have endeavoured in the annexed sketch to preserve for the curious in topography, as I cannot learn that it has ever been engraved, nor is it generally known. The original drawing is in the possession of the Duke of Marlborough. It is much to be regretted, that the first Duke, through the persuasion of the Earl of Godolphin, should have suffered these valuable remains to be razed to the ground, though its relative situation, as a picturesque object, it is natural to suppose, would have preserved it from depredation.

THE site on which this palace stood, is marked to posterity by the circumstance of two sycamore trees, planted on a fine elevation, at a small distance from the bridge : their broad and spreading arms seem to point to the eye of observation and philosophy the happy spot where royalty once resided, and at

at the same time to indicate the sure and fatal ravages either of relentless Time, or the equally destructive effects of a Gothic and tasteless mind.

IN this park was born the father of English poetry, Geoffry Chaucer, who resided here for a considerable time, near the area before the grand entrance, upon the spot on which a modern house now stands :

“ Here he dwelt——

“ For many a chearful day these ancient walls
 “ Have often heard him, while his legends blithe
 “ He sang, of love, or knighthood, or the wiles
 “ Of homely life, through each estate and age,
 “ The fashions and the follies of the world
 “ With cunning hand pourtraying.”

ON a beautiful elevation in this park stands the high lodge, commanding one of the most extensive and elegant scenes in the kingdom. In this earthly paradise, the witty and dissipated earl of Rochester once lived ;
 and

and in this charming retreat he died, according to Dr. Burnett, full of penitence and remorse, earnestly desirous of exchanging this Elyfian scene for one more permanent. Nor does this fact rest solely on the authority of this venerable prelate ; for we find it recorded in a very elegant pastoral by the muse of a contemporary poet, whose effusions have not often, if ever, been so happy.

I.

- “ AS on his death-bed gasping Strephon lay, “ Strephon the wonder of the plains,
 “ The noblest of th’ Arcadian swains ;
 “ Strephon the bold, the witty, and the gay :
 “ With many a sigh and many a tear he said,
 “ Remember me, ye shepherds, when I’m dead.

II.

- “ Ye trifling glories of this world, adieu,
 “ And vain applauses of the age ;
 “ For when we quit this earthly stage,
 “ Believe me, shepherds, for I tell you true ;
 “ Those pleasures which from virtuous deeds we have,
 “ Procure the sweetest slumbers in the grave.

III.

- “ Then since your fatal hour must surely come,
 “ Surely your heads lie low as mine,
 “ Your bright meridian sun decline ;
 “ Befeech the mighty Pan to guard you home :
 “ If to Elysium you would happy flie,
 “ Live not like Strephon, but like Strephon die.”

AMIDST the various beauties of this noble and extensive park, rich in Arcadian scenery, and abounding in subject for poetic fiction, one is naturally led to contemplate the hapless fate of the frail and beauteous Rosamond, whose celebrated name at all times recurs with that of Woodstock. Little indeed remains now to authenticate the truth of her fatal story, except the faint traces of her famous bath, amidst the dark recesses of the groves, about the northern part of the park. Of the bower constructed for her reception—nor of the mazy labyrinth through which she might have been conducted to the palace, concealed from the jealous

jealous eye of Queen Eleanor—it is much to be lamented, that no vestiges are now discoverable; nor does even the rudest sketch of the pencil exist, to throw any light on this romantic subject.

- “ What art can trace the visionary scenes,
- “ The flow’ry groves and everlasting greens,
- “ The babbling fountains that mimic Echo plays,
- “ The fairy shade and its eternal maze ?”

Certain it is, that at the age of fifteen, the charms of this unfortunate daughter of Lord Clifford attracted the attention of the amorous Monarch.

THE history of this accomplished fair one is too well known to need a repetition. The manner of the Queen’s discovering her secret retreat, and the cause of Rosamond’s death, are variously related. By some it is said, that sitting withoutside her bower, to take the air, while busied at her work, she spied the Queen; and in attempting her escape, dropped her ball of filk, which catching in her foot, unravelled, and left a clue for the Queen to discover her retreat. By others it is conjectured, that the thread of filk was dropped accidentally by the king, at the entrance to the bower; but it may as reasonably be concluded, agreeable to the old ballad, that the enraged Queen forced the secret from the Knight who was entrusted with the care of the labyrinth.

“ And forth she calls the trusty knight
 “ In an unhappy hour,
 “ Who, with his clue of twined thread,
 “ Came from this famous bower.”

HISTORIANS of the greatest veracity seem not to credit her being poisoned: it is more than probable that the story might have arisen from the figure of a cup said to have been sculptured on her tomb—no uncommon decoration in a Catholic church.

BROMPTON, Knighton, and Higden, historians of repute, all seem to agree that she died a natural death, soon after her concealment in the bower. Equivocal, and uncertain as the cause of the death of this unfortunate beauty may appear, it is beyond controversy, that she was interred in the choir at Godstow Nunnery, near Oxford, where, in the early and innocent part of her life, she had resided a considerable time ; and in the year 1191, according to Hoveden, the corpse was removed by order of Hugh, Bishop of Lincoln, who, on visiting this nunnery, and observing a tomb covered with silk, and lighted by a profusion of wax tapers, enquired to whom it belonged, and being answered, to Rosamond, mistress to King Henry, he exclaimed, in a fit of zeal, “ Take “ this harlot from hence, and bury her “ without the church, lest through her the “ Christian religion should be scandalized,
 “ and that other women, warned by her ex“ ample,

“ ample, may refrain from unlawful and “ adulterous love.”

THE Queen, in Mr. Addifon’s Opera of Rofamond, thus enjoins her attendants :

“ Beneath those hills, a convent stands,
“ Where the fam’d streams of Isis stray, “ Thither the breathless corse convey,
“ And bid the cloister’d maids with care
“ The due solemnities prepare.”

OF this nunnery little remains but the chapel given in the annexed sketch, and a wall, which denotes it to have been a place
of

of considerable extent. The ground is in several places broken up, and the appearance of an arched way is plainly discernable ; but the story of its having been a subterraneous passage to Woodstock does not seem probable. The same idea takes place with respect to most of the religious houses in the kingdom ; as if popular enquiry could not rest satisfied with detecting the pranks and doublings of nun and priest above ground, but must still, mole-like, be delving after supposed hidden mysteries and communications below.

GODSTOW NUNNERY, or Place of God, was founded about the latter end of the reign of Henry I. by Editha, an inspired matron of Winchester. She persuaded herself, or was persuaded by her priest, that she was directed by a vision to this neighbourhood, where a light from Heaven was to appear, that would point out the spot on which she should

should erect a nunnery. Assisted, afterwards, by various donations of the pious, (for whatever visions she might have been promised, it does not appear that any of them were visions of gold) she was enabled to compleat her project, and about the year 1138, the building was consecrated, and Editha presided as abbess over twenty-four fair nuns. Henry II. and his son, King John, were liberal benefactors to this religious institution. The latter bequeathed a considerable fund for masses to be said, and “ that these holy virgins might relieve “ with their prayers, the soules of his fa“ ther, King Henrie, and of Lady Rosa“ mond, there interred.”

IMMENSE sums were expended at Rosamond's interment, as well by her noble parents as by her enamoured soveriegn, who was lavish in the decorations of this fair unfortunate's tomb; the workmanship of which,

which, according to the description of Ranulph Higden, the historian, “ seems to have “ been of wood, and of wonderful contri“ vance, that her chest, coffin, or tomb, to “ be seen in the chapter-house, is not above
 “ two feet long, or perhaps square, but a “ stupendous piece of workmanship, where-
 “ in might be seen the conflicts of cham“ pions, the gestury of animals, the flight
 “ of birds, with fishes leaping, and all done
 “ without the assistance of man.”

NOTWITHSTANDING the body was removed, as before observed, from the place where it was originally deposited, yet the opinion of the bigoted priest did not obtain much among the minds of the well-informed, by whom she was considered after her death as little less than a saint ;

“ And, ' spite of Fame, her fate revers'd believe,
 “ O'erlook her crimes, and think she ought to live.”

LELAND records the following inscription on a cross, which, he says, stood near the entrance of the nunnery-gate.

“ Qui meat hac oret, signum salutis adoret.

“ Utque sibi detur veniam Rosamunda precetur.”

AFTER the removal of the body from the church it was placed in the chapter-house, whence, says Speed “ the chaste sisters gathered her bones, and put them in a perfumed leather bag, inclosing them so in a lead, and layde them againe in the church under a fayre large grave-stone; about whose edges a fillet of brasse was inlay’d, and thereon written her name and praise: these bones were at the suppression of that nunnery so found.” This agrees with Leland’s account of its situation after the dissolution of the nunnery, “ who says Rosamunde’s tombe at Godstowe nunnery was taken up of late; it is a stone with “ this

“ this inscription, ‘ Tumba Rofamundæ ;’
 “ her bones were clofed in lede, and within “ that, bones were clofed in lether ; when it “ was opened, there was a fweet fmell came “ out of it.”

A LARGE ftone coffin is now ftanding in the chapel, which there is little reafon to believe ever contained the remains of this faded flower.

THE following lines are written on the wall, faid to have been copied from thofe on her tomb :

“ Hic jacet in tumba, Rofa Mundi, non Rofamunda ;
 “ Non redolet, fed olet, quæ redolere folet.”

PERHAPS this recital of well-known circumftances may be thought prolix, and foreign to the fubject ; but as the mind is naturally fond of incident bordering on romance, this legendary tale, as it beguiles the moment, may plead an apology for its introduction.

SECTION IX.

GODSTOW NUNNERY, of which so much has been said in the last section, is contiguous to the bridge bearing that name, approaching which, the view from the river continues to improve in every break and easy winding of its current. The depth of water is encreased, and its verdant meadows greatly enrich the distant prospect, abounding in picturesque scenery, combining the villages of Handborough and Garfington ; these are screened by the range of the Witham Hills, which form a kind of amphitheatre, and on a nearer approach give a grandeur to the landscape, we have not before witnessed. Yet even here the imagination is not gratified : the contiguity of the noble palace of Blenheim, which we have just quitted, recurs to the mind, and we naturally regret, that those hills will in no part admit a distant view of that

that noble edifice. Thus no sooner are we pleased with objects as they appear, but we are desirous of associating with them other forms which cannot be brought within our reach ; and though the barrier is placed by the hand of nature, we are still too apt to disquiet ourselves and verify the observation of Prior, that

“ The wished-for something unpossess’d,
“ Corrodes and leavens all the rest.”

THE Gothic simplicity and the antiquity of Godstow bridge, with the adjoining remains of the nunnery wall, and contiguous woody scenery ; the perpetual moving picture on the water, produced by the passage of west country barges, and the gayer scenery presented by the pleasure boats, and select parties from the neighbouring university, render it in every point of view a happy subject for the pencil.

A CUT is now forming at some distance

above the bridge, which will turn the current of the river a little from its present channel, towards the ruins of the nunnery wall, and when it falls in again with the old stream a little below the bridge, will considerably aid the navigation.

THE beauty of the scenery a little below Godstow still encreases, and the river nobly expanding itself, seems proudly urging its course, to pay its tribute to that ancient and noble seminary of learning, Oxford, whose venerable towers and lofty domes all happily unite to form a general mass of objects superior to any thing which this country can boast.

PASSING nearer to the city, as we approach the village of Medley, each particular in this noble assemblage of buildings is beautifully marked, and happily discriminated by the chearful rays of light now darting on them from a mid-day sun.

NEAR Medley was anciently a very considerable monastery, of which little now remains to mark its former greatness.

WITHIN about a mile of the city the Warwickshire canal approaches very near to the Thames stream, and from that point runs almost parallel with it, till it reaches the place of its destination. The immense utility of this navigation, in the article of coals particularly, promises consequences to this city and the neighbouring country, which, it is to be hoped, will compensate for the heavy expence and great delays which have attended the execution of this spirited adventure.

WE next approach to High or Hithe Bridge, which consists of three arches, but is so confined in situation, as to afford no point sufficiently picturesque to give it a place in this work.

SECTION X.

OF the University and ancient City of Oxford, at once the pride of our own country, and justly the admiration of foreigners, so much has been already written, that it is scarcely possible to advance any thing new on the subject: yet, unequal as I feel myself to the task of making any addition to the history and antiquities of this place, it is, at the same time, so closely connected with my present enquiry, and so richly stored with the elegancies of art and science, that on some of these subjects, I presume, I am by the very nature of my undertaking, called upon to hazard an opinion of my own; I shall, therefore, briefly remark on such works of art, as either appear to have superior merit, or afford observations that may tend to aid a comparison between the state of the arts, at a former period, and that which they hold at present.

THE annexed view of Magdalen bridge, though not properly an appendage of the Thames, has still so much merit in its design, as to render it no unfit object to place at the head of this section : it was begun in the year 1772, by Mr. John Gwynn, who was a native of this city ; whose work, tho' by no means a perfect model of beauty, will still be thought to add more credit to the architect, in point of taste and design, than to those who had the conservancy of the river over which it passes. It is a spacious stone bridge, five hundred and twenty-six feet in length, consisting of eleven arches, five of which are without the necessary accompaniment, water ; under the other six run two shallow branches of the river Cherwell : it certainly forms a noble entrance to the city from the London road, and may possibly be of some utility at a future period, when taste and good sense may take into consideration, should the thing be practicable, the uniting of two streams, which connected would constitute one river that will do honour to the university.

THE High-street, to which the bridge leads, contains the noblest and most diversified assemblage of architectural objects, perhaps, in this country, and strongly impresses the mind with an idea of the magnificence and Gothic splendor of earlier times. The easy curve in which this entrance is constructed, adds much to its beauty, as straight lines (notwithstanding the opinion of Sir Christopher Wren, in his intended plan of London) are certainly not pleasing to the critical eye, though they may contribute to the health and convenience of a great city.

MAGDALEN College, at the foot of the bridge, is a noble specimen of the Gothic style of building : its lofty tower, which is about one hundred and fifty feet high, was erected anno 1492, under the direction of that princely prelate Wolfey, who was at that time Fellow and Burfar of the college. The scale of it may be said to correspond with the daring aims and character of his mind ; and if, as some have said, he exhausted the revenues of the college in this undertaking, it marks them so much the more strongly.

WITHIN these walls the antiquary will find much matter for speculation, particularly in noticing the hieroglyphics cut in stone, which surround the cloisters ; the history of which has been formerly matter of much controversy ; nor is it yet decided, whether it is the work of licentiousness, or a system of morality for the benefit of the college ; college ; so little are we able, in the present day of refinement, to judge of the intentions of our forefathers (at least when speaking in such parables) whether to scourge or to promote impiety. The most prevalent opinion that I have been able to collect, is that they were intended (strange as the ideas may be, which some of these symbolical figures may seem at first view to present) to shadow out the virtues and qualities that should unite in the character of their president,

SOME painted glass in the anti-chapel, though much impaired, has yet excellence enough to recommend it to notice. The altar-piece, representing the Resurrection, painted by Isaac Fuller, is so devoid of merit, as to render it no farther an object of attention than to point out the low state of history painting at that period, comparatively with that of the present day ; if ever his

his taste, as has been reported, led him to the study of Michael Angelo, it certainly seems to have forsaken him when he selected only his imperfections.

MR. ADDISON, who was a more elegant writer than a critic on painting, has bestowed much encomium on this work in a Latin poem, to be found in the Musæ Anglicanæ.

AN ancient custom is still observed in this college:—On May-day morning the choristers sing a latin hymn, precisely as the clock strikes five; and the bridge and neighbourhood, should the morning prove fair, are generally thronged with the listening croud. A lamb used formerly to be roasted whole on the leads of the tower, for breakfast; but in this age of refinement, a dinner is substituted, at which the lamb is not forgotten.

THE court to the grand entrance of the physic-garden, on the left, as you pass the bridge, is from a design of Inigo Jones, executed by Nicholas Stone; it is in the Doric order, with rustic decorations, and is not unworthy so great a master.

QUEEN'S College is a modern structure, begun about the year 1672, and somewhat resembling the style of the Luxemburgh palace. The cupola is certainly not proportionate to the rest of the façade, being much too large, and totally misplaced. It has besides more the air of a canopy held over the Queen than an embellishment to a public edifice. The nick-name of salt-cellar and pepper-box, bestowed on this building and the neighbouring spires of All Souls, by some young students, though ludicrous, is not inapplicable to the whimsical combination of objects, which from hence present themselves in a certain point of view.

QUEEN'S College was founded by Robert Eggesfield, Confessor to Queen Philippa, Consort of King Edward III. in 1340. To the admirers of painted glass twelve windows of considerable merit will be found in the chapel, dated 1518; and one over the altar, representing the Nativity, by Price, in 1717. Several ancient customs are still observed in this college, particularly one on a New-year's-day, when the Burfar of the college gives to each member a needle and thread, with this injunction, "take this and be thrifty." This custom is said to derive its origin from the founder's name, Egglefield, the anagram of which forms in the French, aiguille a needle, and fil a thread.

THE ceremony of introducing a boar's head on Christmas-day is still attended to, and accompanied with much solemnity, by an old monkish carol, which is sung by the Taberders, who bring in the boar's head.

THE

THE origin of the custom of bringing up this boar's head at Christmas is said to have arisen from a taberner or scholar of the society, who walking in the vicinity of Oxford, and reading Aristotle's Logic, was encountered by a wild boar, and in defending himself thrust his Aristotle down his throat, and choaked him, when

“ Instead of avoiding the mouth of the beast,

“ He ramm'd in a volume, and cried—Græcum est.”

I AM doubtful whether this story has not been invented to shew the effect of logic, which I believe to this day is often thrust down the throat of the hearer, and is found instead of improving the faculties, to have overwhelmed them.

IN the chapel of the college of All Souls, founded by Bishop Chichely in 1437, over the altar is a picture by Mengs. The subject is Christ's first appearance to Mary Magdalen after his resurrection, or as it is usually called, the Noli me tangere: there is much clear and brilliant colouring in this picture, particularly in the body of the principal figure. The countenance of the Magdalen is happily and elegantly expressed with a placid mixture of dignity and grief suited to the occasion; but there is about the eyes too much glare of redness. The drawing of the principal figure is likewise formal, and wants elegance; it is, however, with all its defects, a work of much merit. An engraving has been made from it by the late Mr. Sherwin.

SEVERAL other pictures are to be found in this college on historical subjects, by Sir James Thornhill, whose merit in that branch of the art, as an English painter, seems to me to have been unrivalled, till the exertions made by several of our artists in the present period.

IN a small room adjoining to the library are some specimens of painted glaſs, which have been removed from thence, and are co-eval with the foundation of this college. Among theſe are the portraits of Henry VI. and of the founder.

THE ancient cuſtom is ſtill obſerved here of celebrating the diſcovery of a large mallard, or drake, ſaid to be found in a drain or ſewer, at the time of digging for the foundation of the college. This mallard has by ſome been degraded into a gooſe ; be it one or the other, it is certainly the cauſe of a jovial evening in the hall, on the 14th of January, when this merriment is heightened by an excellent old ſong, ſung in commemoration of this event. I ſhall give as a ſpecimen the introductory and concluding ſtanzas.

“ Griffin, buſtard, turkey, capon,

“ Let other hungry mortals gape on ;

“ And on the bones their stomach fall hard ;

“ But let All Souls men have their mallard.

“ Oh ! by the blood of King Edward,

“ Oh ! by the blood of King Edward,

“ It was a fwapping, fwapping, mallard.

“ The Romans once admired a gander

“ More than they did their chief commander ;

“ Because he fav’d, if some don’t fool us,

“ The place that’s call’d from th’ head of Tulus.

“ Oh ! by the blood, &c.

“ Therefore let us sing, and dance a galliard,

“ To the remembrance of the mallard :

“ And as the mallard dives in pool,

“ Let us dabble, dive, and duck in bowl.

THE venerable and Gothic pile, Saint Mary’s church, forms no inconsiderable object in the range of buildings on the north of the High-street. The body of it was erected in the reign of Henry VII. ; and the ponderous tower, with its lofty spire and ornaments, niches, and statues, was added by the

the

the first Bishop of Oxford, in the reign of Henry VIII. who was the last Abbot of Ofeney. The elegant portal was raised by Dr. Owen, Chaplain to Archbishop Laud, in 1637, and strikes me, from the taste of its embellishments and contour of the figure of the Virgin and the infant Christ holding a cross in the pedestal above, as being from a design of Rubens or Diepenbeck. It is singular that the figure of the child holding the cross should have, in those or any other times, been deemed an object worth dwelling upon, as a corroborative proof, among others, of the Archbishop Laud's attachment to popery. It is even supposed to have formed an article of impeachment against that prelate ; but enthusiasm in religious tenets has ever been too fatally marked with sanguinary measures, and a deviation from that which ought to be their first principle—humanity.

ON the south side of the High-street stands University College, founded by King Alfred in 872 : but the present structure was raised in 1634. The hall is of still more modern date, and is in a superior stile of Gothic design. The figure of Alfred, by Wilton, in the common room, is the best piece of sculpture I remember to have seen of that artist : it will not add, however, to this eulogy, when it is observed to be from a model of Rysbrack.

OF that magnificent edifice, the college of Christ's Church, founded by Wolfey, its stately entrance and happy selection of Gothic proportions, too much cannot be said in commendation ; but it is with regret to be observed, that the excellence of its grand front is considerably injured by the contracted situation of the street on which it stands. The spacious and noble quadrangle inspires the mind on a first view with every

every idea of ancient grandeur ; and were there no other remains of the cardinal's princely mind, this alone would bear lasting testimony to his unbounded munificence. The beautiful roof of the elegant stair-case leading to the hall is supported only by a single pillar, which, with the Gothic fret-work in the cieling of the spacious hall above, and the vaulted roof of the choir, particularly said to have been constructed under the direction of Wolfey, are truly deserving of critical observation. The elegant tower was designed by Sir Christopher Wren, and is well adapted to harmonize with the rest of the building.

AMONG the many portraits in the hall are two by Sir Joshua Reynolds ; the one a fine head of Dr. Markham ; the other, of still superior excellence, the charming portrait of Dr. Robinson, the Lord Primate of Ireland, on which if I may venture an opinion, I think his best work in portrait.

Here

Here are two fine heads, the one of Lord Chief Baron Skinner ; the other of Welbore Ellis, Esq; (now Lord Mendip,) by Gainfborough : and an excellent head of Dr. Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells, by Hogarth ; of which an engraving, in this rage for the works of that great master, should not be withheld from the public. At the north corner of the west end of the church, is a window painted by I. Oliver, the subject Peter delivered out of prison by the angel ; the colouring in parts is brilliant, and the drawing throughout much to be admired : it was painted by Isaac Oliver, whom Mr. Walpole conjectures to have been the son of James, the younger brother of the celebrated Peter Oliver. This window was painted by him, when in a very advanced age, having the following inscription :

“ Oliver ætat. suæ 84, anno 1700, pinxit deditque.”

I SHALL

I SHALL remark farther, from Mr. Walpole, of this artist, “that he was estimable “ for his own merit, and that of his family,
 “ and that he alone preserved the secret of “ painting on glass.”

OF the elegant additional building to the north-east of the great quadrangle, called Peckwater Court, the three sides were founded by Dr. Radcliffe, a Canon of this church, under the direction of Dean Aldrich, equally famed for his abilities in the elegant arts, and for his talents as a man of learning. It is regularly noble in its parts, without a redundancy of ornament, and will, in all probability, long remain a monument of the taste and good sense of its architect, the Dean.

THE apartments in the library are noble and spacious, and well constructed for the purposes to which they are applied, except

some of the lower ones, which, I confess, might have been decorated with better judgment : I mean those applied to the reception of General Guise's collection of pictures ; many of which, if original, are so defaced by the hands of injudicious picture cleaners, as to leave very faint remains of excellence, and scarcely to merit a place in the cabinet of a competent and well-skilled amateur in the graphic art. I shall point out a few among them, that seem to have the most excellence, and appear to be genuine works of the masters to whom they are imputed.

THE Martrydom of Erasmus, a sketch for the great picture in St. Peter's church at Rome, by N. Poussin—A sketch of a man and horse, by Vandyck—Three heads, cartoons, by Raphael, on paper—A portrait of the Duke d'Alva, by Titian ; and that of a Venetian Nobleman, its companion ; the heads and hands of which are clear and richly coloured coloured—A holy family, by Parmegiano; the children beautifully painted. The Virgin contemplating her Child; Primaticcio: the head of the Virgin is graceful, and full of elegance; but the figure much too tall—Of the family of the Caracci, represented in a butcher's shop, imputed to the pencil of Annibal; as it is a disputed picture, I shall suspend my judgment as to the master; yet it may be safely allowed to be a work of great merit. The anxiety of the soldier, who is buying the meat, is forcibly expressed; as are likewise the inferior parts of the picture: it is to be regretted, that so much merit has been lavished on so disgusting a subject. Of two pictures, said to be by Raphael, the one a Nativity, the other a Madona, they have been so repaired by a modern hand, that he has fairly eclipsed the fair original.

IN New College, founded by William of Wyckham, the painted glass, by that excellent artist, Jervaise, after the cartoons of Sir Joshua Reynolds, is highly deserving commendation. Though Mr. Jervaise cannot be said to have restored the art of painting on glass, he certainly has greatly contributed to its excellence, by having happily united his labours with some of the first artists of the present day, to give that species of painting something more to recommend it than mere gaudy colouring. This idea will be better proved by a comparison of his works with the old windows in the chapel of this college, which were painted as early as its foundation.

MUCH is due to Mr. Wyatt for his judicious care in attempting to restore the remains of the ancient Gothic altar in the chapel, which, though it may have suffered greatly from the hand of time, and certainly more from the ravages of reformation, is not yet so defaced, that it should be out of the power

power of so masterly an artist, to restore in it, one of the finest specimens of ancient elegance in the Gothic style, remaining in this Kingdom.

IN Wadham College will be found a work of Isaac Fuller of a singular kind. It is an altar-piece, painted on an ash-coloured cloth, which serves as a middle tint to the shades, which are of brown crayon. The lights are heightened by white, and being worked up as a crayon picture, and pressed with hot irons, which cause an exudation from the canvass, so incorporate the crayon with the texture of the canvass, as to render the colours proof against the hard rubbing even of a brush.

THE second court at Trinity College, is, from a design of Sir Christopher Wren, and may justly vie with any modern edifice in this this univerſity. A curious manuſcript of Euclid is ſhewn in the library : it is a tranſlation from the Arabic into Latin, before the diſcovery of the original Greek by Adalardus Bathoniensis, in 1130.

IN Worcester College will likewiſe be found an invaluable treaſure, Inigo Jones's Palladio, with his own manuſcript notes in Italian. It was bequeathed to this college by Dr. Clarke. In the poſſeſſion of the Duke of Devonſhire is another work of this kind, with notes in Latin.

IN the various colleges and halls in this venerable receptacle of knowledge, each has its ſhare of learned and curious treaſures, which, from the brevity of this work, are too numerous to be particularized. I have, therefore, only aimed at a few ſlight remarks on ſuch objects as ſtruck me moſt forcibly,
and

and which, I hope, may serve as an apology for passing unobserved many things that more informed minds might have brought forward to notice, in one of the first seminaries in the universe.

SECTION XI.

ON quitting Oxford, we passed the ancient bridge, formerly called Grand Pont, or South Bridge, but which is now better known by the appellation of Folly Bridge. It is said, by some, to have derived this name from the circumstance of Friar Bacon having chosen this spot, being on the side of a public road, and on the banks of a navigable river, for the situation of his study—a situation, of all others, it should seem, the least adapted to the purposes of retirement and cultivation of the mind. Another, and more probable, account is, that it was so called from some original defect in the arches, which were obliged to be supported by additional means. The bridge was built, according to Anthony Wood's account of Oxford, as early as the Conquest, by Robert D'Oyley, on the site of one still older, which is said, by authentic records, to have been standing prior to the time of King Etheldred.

THE ancient tower, called Friar Bacon's Study, to which I have just referred, stood at the south end of this bridge, and was occupied by him as an observatory. This friar was of the Franciscan order, and a celebrated astronomer. From his philosophical discoveries, and particularly the invention of gun-powder, he had, amongst the vulgar, the imputation of being a magician, and, from those better informed, the epithet of Doctor Mirabilis. It was ridiculously said of this tower, that whenever it fell, a more learned man than the friar must necessarily be passing under it. Without reproach to the learning of the university, it appears, however, to have stood some centuries, and, at length, a few years since, it came down, in the course of other improvements than those those of science, and not because some one more learned than the friar happened to be then passing that way.

THE noble College of Christ Church, and its contiguous buildings, form a beautiful combination of objects from the neighbouring meadows on the margin of the river. At the extremity of these meadows the river Cherwell unites itself with the Thames, which gently winds its current through a delightful range of verdant scenery, Oxford still remaining in view, till we reach the village of Iffley, about a mile and a half below the city. This enchanting spot is a combination of all that is desirable in picturesque landscape. It is situated on a beautiful eminence, commanding an extensive distance, which includes every object in the university; the scene is completed by the meandering course of the river beneath, on the banks of which, immediately under the eye, is a spacious mill, worked by the current of the stream, which gives a happy foreground to the rural objects above. From such an assemblage, what a complete selection of parts for the pencil of a Hobbima or a Ruysdael! The admirers of English landscape, will, I flatter myself, receive some gratification from the annexed sketch, which, being faithful, will convey a tolerable idea of the beauties of the scenery.

THE church of Iffley, on the summit, is a fine remain of the Saxon style of building, particularly its portal, which is richly decorated.

DR. NOWEL has a most enviable and charming residence in this vicinity.

A LITTLE below this scene we reach Sandford lock and mill, where the soft and elegant views, for which this river in some parts parts is so peculiarly distinguished, begin to display themselves in an eminent degree. The luxuriant hand of Nature has here been peculiarly diffusive : the rich clumps of trees and verdant lawns, perpetually meeting the eye at every break of the river, on our approach to Nuneham Courtenay, strongly impress the mind of the admirer of rural objects, and leave not a wish to examine the easy negligences of nature by the rigid and severe rules of art ; the effect of such an enquiry can only tend to diminish our pleasures in the pursuit of picturesque scenery, where nature will be found to be invariably right, though some parts, taken separately, might be pointed out as disgusting, and

“ Figures monstrous and mis-shap’d appear,

“ Consider’d singly, or beheld too near,

“ Which, but proportion’d to their light, or place,

“ Due distance reconciles to form and grace.”

SECTION XII.

PURSUING the course of the river, the landscape, as we approach Earl Harcourt's, at Nuneham Courtenay, both from its natural situation, and highly cultivated state of improvement, forms a selection of picturesque objects so happily combined as to be deemed classically elegant. The well-chosen situation of this mansion is worthy the taste of its noble owner, where, from every point, the eye of observation meets the highest gratification. The city of Oxford, at the distance of six miles, happily bounds the view towards the north, while, on the other side, the town of Abingdon gradually rises, amidst a rich and fertile country, interspersed with villages and fruitful woods. The Berkshire Downs and Vale of White Horse appear across the neighbouring bouring meadows, which are pleasingly intersected by the easy winding of the river, which, for many miles, is visible from either side this charming retreat.

THE house, which is of stone, was built by the late Earl, about thirty years since, and is well situated amidst a beautiful park of twelve hundred acres in extent; which park, with the gardens containing about thirty-eight acres, were principally laid out by the celebrated Mr. Brown. The flower-garden does not contain more than an acre and a quarter; yet its beautiful irregularity, and happy situation by nature, together with its high state of cultivation from the hand of taste, in the disposal of the shrubberies, &c. aided by the well-chosen selection of busts, vases, &c. render it altogether the most perfect assemblage I remember to have seen. The beauties of this enchanting spot cannot be more happily expressed than in the elegant

elegant lines of Andrew Marvel, inscribed on a tablet above the center arch in the bower :

“ Society is all but rude
 “ To this delicious solitude ;
 “ Where all the flowers and trees do close,
 “ To weave the garland of repose.”

WITHIN the house are many elegant apartments, particularly the drawing room, the design of which seems to have been from the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall.

THE selection of pictures is, as may be imagined from the well-known taste of the noble owner, formed with much judgment. Four large landscapes in the great drawing-room, by Van Artois, three of which are enriched with the figures of Teniers, are a happy combination of the superior talents of those great masters. The celebrated landscape by Rubens, the subject of which is, a cart overturning by moonlight, or, as it is called, La Charette Embourbee, is a duplicate of that in the Houghton collection. The Naval regatta, on the Texel, by Van de Velt, junior, is one of the first works of that excellent painter ; the variety of vessels, and multitude of figures, all busily employed, are touched with so much delicacy and precision, as to mark the superiority of the master ; the clear tone of colouring in the sky, and happy transparency of the water, in this picture, are wonderful. The Moon-light on the water, by Vander Meer, and the Landscape, by Both, are capital works.

I SHALL forbear to remark further on this valuable collection of pictures, and refer to the ancient maps of England, which are curiously wrought in tapestry, and are here preserved in a spacious room, built expressly for their reception by their noble possessor. They were purchased, about ten years since, at the sale of the late Mr. Sheldon's effects, at his mansion at Weston, near Long Compton, in Warwickshire.

THESE maps are certainly the earliest specimens of tapestry-weaving in this kingdom. The rivers, hills, clumps of trees, and even windmills, are particularly expressed, and with much art in their execution ; but the names of the towns, &c. are frequently ill-spelt. The names of Francis and Richard Hicke appear on them ; but whether they were the weavers or designers of this work, is not clearly understood,

FOR the introduction of this manufactory into the kingdom, we are indebted to Mr. William Sheldon, in the reign of Hen. VIII. In every map the Sheldon arms, with all their quarterings, are introduced. This Mr. William Sheldon died in 1570.

THE maps were purchased by Mr. Horace Walpole, at the above sale for thirty guineas, and were by him presented to Earl Harcourt.

AT a small distance from the house, the late Earl has erected an elegant church from a plan of his own in the Ionic order, which, from the singularity of its design, is highly deserving notice.

DESCENDING the beautiful lawns, which form an easy slope towards the margin of the river, the spacious mansion of Sir James Stonehouse, at Radley, on the opposite side of the water, appears a pleasing object, and to the left of the grounds, in a very picturesque situation, the eye is delighted with the fine remains of that venerable piece of antiquity removed from Oxford, commonly called Carfax, which is here preserved by his Lordship

Lordship from any further depredation, except that of all-consuming Time.

THE recess in which it is placed is amidst a stately and variegated thicket of trees, so happily disposed as to seem purposely designed for its reception. The original situation of this piece of antiquity is well known to have been in the centre of the principal street in Oxford; and, probably, from its situation in the middle of four ways, or quatre voiz (in old French) it obtained the vulgar

gar appellation of Carfax ; or, perhaps, with as much probability, from Carrefour, the place where several streets meet.

THE decayed state of this building, and its inconvenient situation, induced the University very lately to take it down, and judiciously to place it in hands, where it might remain a gratification to the curious, and a pleasing monument of antiquity. The noble Earl has caused some Latin and English lines to be inscribed on this building, on its being placed in his ground ; the latter of which run as follows :

This building called Carfax,
Erected for a Conduit at Oxford,
By Otho Nicholson,
In the year of our Lord MDCX.
And taken down in the year MDCCLXXXVII.
To enlarge the High Street,
Was presented by the University
To George Simon, Earl Harcourt,
Who caused it to be placed here.

A BRIEF account of this venerable pile may perhaps not prove unacceptable to the reader ; I shall give it from a manuscript formerly in the possession of Mr. Hanwell, deputy treasurer of Christ Church College, in the university of Oxford: he says “ It “ was built in 1610, by Otho Nicholson, “ M. A. the expence of which building, to“ gether with the charge of bringing the “ water by pipes from the conduit-house,
 “ near Hinksey, cost two thousand five hun“ dred pounds. After its erection the found“ er was made treasurer to King James I. In “ Christ Church Library, which was for-

QUITTING this delightful scenery, and pursuing the course of the river towards Abingdon, about a mile below Nuneham, the retrospective view of the country, and noble buildings interspersed in its vicinity, is truly delightful. Within about a mile of the town of Abingdon, a new cut is formed for the convenience of the navigation, which has rendered the old stream towards Culham bridge entirely useless ; this cut has not only shortened the distance towards Abingdon very considerably, but is become necessary from the shallowness of the stream, which in dry seasons has not sufficient water for the purposes of navigation.

View at Abington Berks.

SECTION XIII.

THE approach towards Abingdon by an easy sweep of the current affords a very pleasing view, but the drought of the present season rendered the passage at Abbey Lock impracticable, and subjected us to some inconvenience, as we were there obliged to have the boat dragged over.

NEAR Abingdon the river Ock washes the south side of the town. This small river derives its source from the Vale of White-Horse, near Kingston-Lisle, and gently winding its current empties itself, near Abingdon, into the Ouse, which river flowing northward from Faringdon divides its stream as it enters this town.

THE annexed view, though not properly upon the Thames, is yet so closely connected with it, as to render it a necessary appendage to this work.

ABINGDON is of very great antiquity ; its ancient appellation was Sheovesham ; and Camden conjectures that synods were held here as early as 742 ; and an anonymous writer observes, “ that it was in ancient times
 “ a famous city, goodly to behold, full of “ riches, encompassed with very fruitful “ fields, green meadows, spacious pastures,
 “ and flocks of cattle abounding with milk.

“ HERE the king kept his court, and hither
 “ the people resorted, while consultations “ were depending about the greatest and “ most weighty affairs of the kingdom.”

CISS, a King of the West Saxons, built a spacious abbey here, about the year 675, soon after

after which it assumed the name of Abbandun, or the Abbey's Town. This abbey was soon after destroyed by the Danes, but by the liberality of King Edgar, and the industry of the Norman abbots, it recovered its magnificence, and rivalled in wealth and grandeur any abbey in the kingdom. William the Conqueror resided here some time; and in this abbey his son Henry received his education.

OF the cross, of excellent workmanship, erected in the Market-place by Henry VI. as mentioned by Leland and others, no traces are remaining; it was destroyed in the civil wars.

THE consequence of this abbey was such, as to afford a principal support to the town, till the reign of Henry V. by whom a bridge was constructed over the Thames at Culham, and another at Burford, across the river

ver Ouse. From that circumstance the town of Abingdon acquired so much additional traffic, as to rank amongst the first towns in the county. The building these bridges, in 1416, was under the immediate order of the King, as appears from the following Latin distich, formerly inscribed on a window, in the church of St. Helens, in this town :

“ Henricus Quintus, quarto fundaverat anno,

THE work was considerably assisted by the donations of Jeffray Barbur, a wealthy merchant of this place who gave a thousand marks towards completing it, and making a causeway between the bridge of Culham and that of Abingdon, and in consequence the high road to London was turned through the town. His monument, which is now in the church of St. Helens, was originally in the abbey church, church, whence it was removed by the inhabitants at the Dissolution.

THE following lines, selected from a quaint translation of some Latin verses, mentioned by Ashmole, may tend to give a general idea of the state of bridge building in the time of Henry V. and of the great advantages expected to be derived from it by the people at large.

“ King Henry the Fifth, in the fifth of his reign,
 “ At Burford and Culham did bridges build twain; “ Between these two places, but from Abingdon most,
 “ The King’s highways now may be easily past;
 “ In one thousand four hundred and ten more by fix,
 “ This so pious work did his Majesty fix:
 “ Ye passengers now who shall travel this way,
 “ Before that you mind for the founder to pray.

“ King Henry the Fifte, in his fourth yere,
 “ He hath I found for his folke a bridge in Berkeschure,
 “ For cartis with cariage may goo and come clere,
 “ That many wynters afore were marred in the myre,

“ Her kyn and her knowlech caught hem up with care.

“ Upon the day of Seynt Albon they began this game,
“ And John Huchyns layde the firste stoon in the Kynges

“ It was a solace to see in a somer sefonny,
“ C. C. C. I wyffe working onys,

 “ But for myrthe, and in memory to young and to olde.”

A HANDSOME wharf is lately completed at the extremity of the town of Abingdon, beyond which the new cut, forming a ſmall curve, joins the main river a little below Culham bridge ; which, with the neighbouring town, affords no unpleaſing object.

THE village of Sutton Courtenay, about a mile from the bridge, happily terminates the view from the water ; and the contiguous mill and lock greatly enrich the beauty of the ſcenery. The toll of this lock is very heavy on the commerce of this river, being one pound fifteen ſhillings on every barge. We paſſed it on a Sunday, and conſequently the mill not being at work, the want of water obliged us to have the boat dragged over the neighbouring meadows for more than half a mile, which occasioned no small delay, and a considerable expence.
 the

THE general face of the country in our farther progress was dull and uninteresting 'till we approached Dorchester ; where, passing Appleford, the village of Long Wittenham, and the contiguous range of hills, considerably enrich the scene. Within this church, under the King's Arms, which are placed over the rood-loft, is the following whimsical Latin distich—

“ Qui leo de Juda est, & flos de Jesse, leones

“ Protegat, & flores Carole Magne tuos.”

NEAR this is a figure of Death, under which is the following couplet—

“ Man is a glass, life is as water weakly wall'd about,

“ Sin brought in Death, Death breaks the glass, so

“ runs this water out.”

FROM Long Wittenham the river winds suddenly towards Clifton, a village in Oxfordshire, where the combination of objects is truly picturesque. A small church, situated on a richly variegated bank, rising almost perpendicularly on the border of the river, (on which the traffic of the ferry-boats gives a perpetually moving picture) cannot but attract the eye of observation. The water here is remarkably shallow, yet perfectly transparent, and beautifully shews the clear and gravelly bed of the river. Passing Burcot, the mansion of Mr. Bush, the extensive woody scenery of his grounds forms a beautiful screen on the Oxfordshire side of the river for a considerable distance.

As we approach Little Wittenham, the scenery is rich, and the objects so happily combined, and within so confined a space, as to render them fit subjects for the pencil.

TOWARDS

TOWARDS Dorchester the river narrows exceedingly, and for a great extent runs nearly in a straight line, which gives it more the appearance of a pleasurable canal than a navigable river. Here the sombre shades of the neighbouring woods are beautifully reflected, and give a happy serenity to the scene. Near this spot the river Tame empties itself into the main stream, where a wooden bridge is constructed for a communication with the neighbouring meadows. This river rises in the county of Bucks, and passes the town to which it gives appellation; where,

“ With a faint kiss it mocks the walls of Tame,
 “ And leaves behind her nothing but a name.”

It next visits Dorchester,

“ Which wondering at her speed,
 “ Most gladly bids the happy match succeed.”

So sings the author of the poem on the Marriage of Tame and Isis.

DOR-

DORCHESTER is a town at present of little consequence, but formerly it held a considerable rank among the British cities, by the name of Civitas Dorcinia. It was anciently a bishop's see, founded by one Birinus, called the apostle of the West Saxons, to whom the common people paid so great a veneration, that in the history of Alchester it is said, "A round hill there still appears, where the superstitious ages built Birinus a shrine, teaching them that had any cattle amiss, to creep to that shrine." A blacksmith in the town is in possession of the gold ring, said to have been that of Birinus. Near this ancient town of Dorchester, the Tame forms a junction with the main river, from which it is by many absurdly believed to have derived the appellation of Thames.

SECTION XIV.

THE beauty of the scenery from the vicinity of Dorchester, greatly improves in verdure and richness. The easy sloping hills on the Berkshire side of the river are crowned with a variegated combination of sylvan objects; while here and there a chalky break in the cliff renders the view strikingly diversified, and highly interesting. The short reaches in the river, as we approach towards Shillingford, it must be allowed, prevent that extent of scenery which is perhaps necessary to form what may be called majestic in landscape; yet the parts, though simple, are so happily associated, as to be truly gratifying to the eye.

THE

THE light and elegant bridge of Shillingford, with the variety of carriages that are continually passing and repassing, aided by the gliding objects on the water beneath, greatly add to the natural beauty of the landscape. In this delightful retreat the skilful angler finds high gratification in his pursuit, and ample sources of contemplation.

“ Here blisful thoughts his mind engage,
 “ To crowd’d, noisy scenes unknown ;
 “ Wak’d by some bard’s instructive page,
 “ Or calm reflections all his own.”

THE river makes a beautiful curve below Shillingford, at the termination of which Benfington, or Benfon church, which has been recently repaired, meets the eye in a pleasing point of view ; little more than the spire, which is perfectly white, appears above a luxuriant range of yellow waving corn fields, fields, while in the distance the back ground is formed from the hills of Nettlebed and the adjoining woods.

THE village of Benson, though at present of little note, is extremely ancient, and formerly had the appellation of a royal vill. It was taken from the Britons in 572, and held by the West Saxons for two hundred years after; when Offa, King of Mercia, being determined they should hold no place on this side the water, forcibly possessed himself of it in 778.

AT a small distance from this village formerly stood a beautiful structure, occupied as a royal palace, called Ewelme, or New Elm, which was built by William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, but has long been suffered, from its unhealthy situation, to fall into decay. West of the church a Roman road passed the river near this place, and took its direction towards Sylchester, in Hampshire, formerly the celebrated Vindoma or Vindonum of the Romans, and the Caer Segont of the Britons.

A LITTLE below Benson is a spacious lock and mill, which, with the gentle fall of its waters, forming a continual cascade, connects a pleasing selection of objects, highly worthy the exertions of an artist; and it is with regret I feel that the present work is so limited as to admit but a small part of those beauties, which are ever presenting themselves to the eye.

SECTION XV.

FROM Benson lock the ancient bridge and town of Wallingford appear, at about a mile distance, across the neighbouring meadows ; but the objects there are not so happily combined for the pencil, as at the view from below the bridge, whence the annexed sketch was taken. The antiquity of the bridge, from its appearance, seems to vie with the oldest structure of the kind on the Thames: it is truly Gothic, and of immense strength. The pointed angular sterlings on the upper side are so well constructed, as to be capable of resisting the most violent torrent of water from the winter floods. The spire of the church was built about eighteen years since, at the sole expence of the late Judge Blackstone ; and, though singular in its taste, is not an unpleasing object.

WALLINGFORD is supposed to have been the chief city of the Attrebatii, and is called by Antoninus, Attrebatum. Camden conjectures its British name to have been Gualhen, which signifies the “old fort”: from thence its present appellation “Wallingford” is derived. Here the shallowness of the stream certainly rendered it most commodious for the purposes of fording across.

THE town of Wallingford, in the reign of Edward the Confessor (which was prior to the construction of the bridge) appears by Doomſday Book to have contained two hundred and seventy-six houses, “yielding nine pounds tax,—and those that dwelt there did the King service on horseback, or else by sea.”

A FINE ruin of the old castle presents itself not far from the river side, formerly so well fortified as to be deemed impregnable ;

nable; which is proved from the frequent attacks made on it by King Stephen, in which he was always repulsed. The origin of this castle is allowed to have been as early as the invasion of the Romans, and its demolition about the time of the Danes and Saxons. It was restored after the defeat of Harold, by William the Conqueror, who passing with his army across the Thames at the ford, encamped on this spot before he marched to London.

It appears that this place made a vigorous defence in favour of the Empress Matilda, and her son Henry then abroad, against Stephen, who raised a considerable fort on the opposite side of the river at a place called Craumasth. Henry soon after coming to England, attempted the relief of the place, while Stephen was equally desirous of giving succour to the besiegers. Both parties, however, being dissatisfied with their situation,

wisely agreed to a compromise ; and a conference being held on the banks of the Thames, the result was, that Stephen should enjoy the crown during his life, and that Henry should succeed him. The castle probably remained in a ruined state from about that period till the time of the civil wars, when an order was issued for its total demolition. That original order, signed by Thurlow, Secretary to Cromwell, was in the possession of an Alderman of Wallingford, who died about six years since.

THIS town lost much of its popularity from a dreadful plague, which happened in the year 1348; at which time, according to Leland, it contained fourteen churches; at present it has only three. Its consequence, history says, was much diminished by the building of Culham and Dorchester bridges, which removed a great part of the traffic to Abingdon and other towns contiguous.

THE

THE manor of Wallingford was, with other manors, granted for the support of the Dukedom of Cornwall, a title first conferred on the Black Prince, son of Edward III. in 1355, and which appertained to that Dukedom till the reign of Henry VIII. when Cardinal Wolsey having formed the noble design of erecting Christ Church College, at Oxford, the monarch granted him this manor and castle in aid of the undertaking; but on the Cardinal's disgrace, they reverted to the King. The castle remains to this day in the possession of the college; but the manor was annexed by the Sovereign to that of Ewelme, or New Elm, near Benson.

WITHIN the west gate of the town formerly stood a priory of black monks, which belonged to the Abbey of St. Alban's, and which was suppressed by order of Wolsey. This suppression, it is conjectured, might have given a colour of sanction to the King for

for proceeding farther in a general seizure of all ecclesiastical revenues; but it does not appear by his general conduct, that he stood in need of any example of rapacity.

NEAR Brightwell, adjoining to Wallingford, formerly stood a castle, of which no traces are now remaining. It was taken by storm previous to the conclusion of the peace between King Henry and Stephen.

A LITTLE below the town of Wallingford, at Mongewell, on the Oxfordshire side of the river, the late Bishop of Salisbury, and now of Durham, Dr. Barrington, possesses a delightful retreat, richly embosomed, amidst a thicket of trees. Full in view of the house a beautiful verdant lawn skirts the borders of the Thames, which, gliding at a pleasing distance from it, gradually makes its course with a considerable increase of water towards the village of Moulsoford, Moulsford, while the distant Oxfordshire hills present a beautiful termination of the scene.

CLEVE mill and lock, a little lower down the stream, meet the eye before we reach the picturesque combination of objects at the village of Goring, whose romantic and sequestered situation it is not possible for the eye of observation to pass unnoticed. The Berkshire hills form a richly variegated background, and the easy ascent of the lawns in the front happily intersect the principal objects, and give a charming relief to the whole. In the annexed view this scene is faintly represented ; yet faint as it is, it cannot fail to strike the admirer of simple nature in landscape, as a combination of objects worthy to be impressed on the mind.

THE village of Streetly on the opposite side the river, has equal claim to notice ; it is situated on a Roman highway near Ickenild-street, which here enters Berkshire, and runs across the neighbouring downs, passing Baffelden ; near which place, on an easy ascent from the borders of the river, stands the grotto-house, lately the residence of Mr. Sykes. It is happily screened by the Berkshire hills, and was originally occupied by Lady Fane, whose shells and corals may perhaps be thought to have been too highly complimented, in some lines preserved in Doddsley's Miscellanies.

THE village of Gathanton is a pleasing object on the Oxfordshire side the river, from whence we enter a beautiful enclosure, formed by the surrounding woods. The happy serenity of the approaching evening gives an air of solemnity to the scene, while the moon, faintly rising, gleams through the beautifully variegated trees. The profound stillness of the air was not unpleasantly disturbed turbed by the largest flight of ravens, daws, &c. that I remember to have seen ; it consisted of some thousands, who nightly cross the river to take up their abode among the neighbouring woods.

AT a small distance from the river, on the Berkshire side, Sir Francis Sykes has erected a spacious mansion, which is secluded from the view by the intercepting hills. The house, though superbly furnished, is still wanting in the more elegant decorations of the fine arts, which have not yet gained admission.

AT Pangbourn the river widens considerably, and the fall of water is so great on the opening of the lock, as to cause much delay in the progress of the navigation. This place is much frequented by the angler, who, in his favourite pursuit, may occasionally find equal cause for an exertion of his patience as his skill in the art. Among the various sorts of fish produced in this part of the river, the pike in particular is found of a remarkable large size.

THE village of Whitchurch, on the opposite side, presents no unpleasing object in landscape. The road from Pangbourn towards Reading runs, for a considerable distance, nearly parallel with the river, and affords in many places a rich and variegated scenery.

PURLEY-HALL, about a mile distance, is the residence of Warren Hastings, Esq. Its appearance seems by no means suited in point of elegance to the splendor of an Eastern Governor. It is somewhat singular, that the greater part of this house was erected by the famous Mr. Hawes, the great South-Sea defaulter.

LOWER down, on the Oxfordshire side of the river, at Hardwick, is the residence of Mr. Gardener, formerly in the possession of Mr. Powis. It is happily sheltered by the neighbouring hills, and at an agreeable distance from the river. This house was probably in former times a monastery ; and its situation is chosen with that degree of attention to the conveniencies, and even luxuries, of this transitory state, for which the founders of most of our religious houses have been famed.

A SMALL distance from hence is the village of Maple-Durham, contiguous to which is a fine old mansion, occupied by Mr. Blount ; which, by the style of its architecture, seems to have been built about the period of Elizabeth or James. It stands at the extremity of the village, and its grand front commands a rich and beautiful park ; but the opposite side towards the river is so walled in, and encumbered cumbered with out-buildings, as to banish the river scenery, which can alone give a complete finish to a picturesque view.

FROM hence the stream bends its course towards Caversham, a distance of about three miles, which affords but little variety of scenery. The warren in the neighbourhood of Caversham is very extensive, and commands a beautiful view across the river.

SECTION XVI.

THE scenery towards Caversham, as we approach the bridge, is much confined, nothing presenting itself but a faint view of the old Abbey gate, at Reading : I have therefore selected the eastern view of the bridge, as best adapted to illustrate the present pursuit, where the tower of the old church and part of the village appearing in the fore-ground, with the range of hills in the distance, give a tolerable idea of the country.

CAVERSHAM had formerly a small priory, which was a cell to the monastery at Nottely, in Buckinghamshire. In the Philosophical Transactions, No. 261, is the following singular circumstance in Natural History: “ There was discovered in the neigh“ bour-

“ bourhood a large stratum of oyster-shells, “ lying on a bed of green sand, and extend“ ing to five or six acres of ground, with “ a bed of blueish clay immediately above
 “ it. Among these many were found with “ both the valves or shells lying together,
 “ and though in moving them, one of the “ valves hath frequently broke off from “ its fellow, it is plain by comparing and “ joining them, that they originally belong“ ed to each other.”

THE town of Reading, with its churches and the remains of the abbey and castle, forms a noble and extended view across the Forebury, as it is vulgarly called, or rather the Fauxbourg or suburbs.

READING, the most considerable town in the county, is situated on the Thames and Kennett, which latter rises near Merdon in Wiltshire,

Wiltshire, and is navigable for vessels of an hundred tons burthen, from Newbury to this town, through which it takes its course in several considerable streams, and abounds with gudgeons, pike, eels, dace, and trout, the latter of which grow to an amazing size.

OF Reading Castle, which Leland conjectures stood at the West end of Castle-street, no remains are now discoverable; it is therefore more probable, that on the ruins we find near the precincts of the abbey, the castle stood, which was the retreat of the Danes in 871, where they fortified themselves after their defeat by King Alfred. In the next year it was abandoned to the Saxons, who destroyed the town; and in the reign of Henry II. this castle was totally demolished, as being a place of refuge for the adherents of King Stephen.

THE abbey was founded by Henry I. on

the

the site of a small nunnery, erected by the mother of Edward the Martyr, to expiate his death, which was perpetrated by one of her domestics. It was endowed with great revenues for two hundred Benedictine monks, and dedicated to the Virgin and a numerous list of Saints. In riches and magnificence it certainly vied with any abbey in the kingdom, and its abbots being mitred sat in the House of Peers, and assumed a high authority, which Henry VIII. in no small degree humbled, by hanging up Farrington, the last abbot of this place, with two of his monks, for refusing to surrender, on the demand of the visitors, soon after the Reformation. It is remarkable, that on the same day the abbot of Glastonbury suffered the like punishment for the same offence.

THIS abbey has been the burial-place of many royal and noble persons, among whom the remains of a part of Henry I. the founder

der

der, were deposited—I say a part, for Dr. Ducarel observes, that his heart, eyes, tongue, brains and bowels, were conveyed to the priory church of Notre Dame du Pres, at Rouen, in Normandy. His second Queen, Adeliza, and his daughter, the Empress Maud, were likewise interred here. This royal dame was daughter of a King—wife to a King (Henry IV. Emperor of Germany)—and mother to King Henry II. The following distich was inscribed on her tomb :

“ Magna ortu, majorque viro, fed maxima partu,
 “ Hic jacet Henrici filia, sponsa, parens.”

LITTLE remains of this extensive abbey, except part of Our Lady's chapel, and the refectory, which is upwards of eighty feet long, and forty broad—an ample space for the luxuriant tables of the pampered abbots, where “ Triumphant plenty, with a cheerful grace, “ Bask'd in their eyes, and sparkled in their face :

“ No learn’d debates annoy’d their downy trance,
 “ Or difcompos’d their pompous ignorance.
 “ Deep funk in down, they, by Sloth’s gentle care,
 “ Shunn’d the inclemencies of morning air,
 “ And left to tatter’d crape—the drudgery of pray’r.”

THE anecdote of King Harry and one of the Abbots of Reading, though well known, has so much humour that I cannot avoid repeating it verbatim from Ful-ler’s Church History——He calls it “ A “ pleasant and true story:—King Henry “ VIII. as he was hunting in Windfor Fo“ rest, either casually lost, or (more proba“ bly) wilfully losing himself, struck down
 “ about dinner-time to the Abbey of Read“ ing, when disguising himself, much for “ delight, (more for discovery to see unseen)
 “ he was invited to the Abbot’s table, and “ passed for one of the King’s guards, a “ place to which the proportion of his per“ son might properly entitle him. A fir“ loin of beef was set before him, (so knight“ ed,

“ ed, faith tradition, by this King Henry ;)
 “ on which the King laid on lustily, not dis-“ gracing one of that place, for whom he “ was mistaken. Well fare thy he art, “ (quoth the Abbot) and here in a cup “ of sack I remember the health of his “ Grace your Master ; I would give an hun“ dred pounds on the condition I could feed
 “ so heartily on beef as you doe. Alas ! my “ weak and squeasie stomach will hardly di“ gest the wing of a small rabbit or chicken.
 “ The King pleasantly pledged him, and “ heartily thanked him for his good chear ;
 “ after dinner departed, as undiscovered as “ he came thither. Some weeks after, the “ Abbot was sent for by a Purfuivant, “ brought up to London, clapt in the “ tower, kept close prisoner, fed for a short “ time on bread and water ; yet not so empty
 “ his body of food, as his mind was filled “ with fears, creating many suspicions to “ himself, when, and how he had incurred
 “ the

“ the King’s displeasure. At last a fir-loin “ of beef was set before him, on which the “ Abbot fed as the farmer of his grange,
 “ and verified the proverb, that two hungry “ meals make the third a glutton. In “ springs King Henry, out of a private lob-“ bie, where he had placed himself the invisi“ ble spectator of the Abbot’s behaviour;
 “ My Lord, (quoth the King) presently de“ posit your hundred pounds in gold, or else
 “ no going hence all the daies of your life.
 “ I have been your physician, to cure you of “ your squeasie stomach; and here, as I de“ serve, I demand my fee for the same. The “ Abbot down with his dust, and glad he had “ escaped so, returning to Reading, as some“ what lighter in purse, so much more mer“ rier in heart than when he came thence.”

A GREAT part of the remains of this venerable abbey, were removed a few years since by General Conway, for the purpose of building

building a bridge contiguous to Park-place, on the road between Henley and Wargrave. The great gate of the abbey, of which I have prefixed a sketch at the end of this section, though it has undergone many material alterations, is in very good repair. It had formerly embattlements, the loss of which has considerably diminished its venerable appearance.

NEARLY opposite to Reading, is the noble mansion built by the Earl of Cadogan; it is situated on an eminence, and commands a very extensive and diversified view of Berkshire, and the adjacent countries. The honours of this family were derived from William Cadogan, who signalized himself under the great Duke of Marlborough. He was first created Baron Reading, and afterwards, Viscount Caversham. The house is now occupied by Major Marsac.

A LITTLE below Reading, the river Kennett, gently winding through the adjacent meadows, unites itself with the Thames, which is here considerably expanded in its course towards Sunning Bridge,—a distance of about three miles.

SECTION XVII.

SUNNING Bridge is a plain modern structure of brick, well adapted for convenience and durability. The annexed view was taken from below the bridge, as the objects there combined most happily to afford a picturesque landscape. The house, which appears over the bridge, is the residence of Lady Rich, whose family has long occupied this spot.

THE village of Sunning is agreeably situated on an easy ascent on the banks of the Thames, and is of great antiquity; it was formerly the see of a Bishop, whose diocese included the counties of Berks and Wilts. The see was afterwards removed to Sherbourn, and thence translated to Salisbury, whose Bishop is now Lord of the Manor of Sunning, and formerly had a palace there.

THE antiquity of this place is strongly marked by the sepulchral monuments and ancient inscriptions within the church, one of which containing some lines on two infants of the family of Rich above mentioned, I am induced from their style to insert :

“ The father’s air, the mother’s look,
“ The sportive smile, and pretty joke,
“ The rosy lips, sweet babbling grace,
“ The beauties of the mind and face;
“ And all the charms of infant souls,
“ This tomb within its bosom holds.”

THE river Kennet washes this place, into which a small rivulet, called the Loddon, empties itself, previous to its junction with the Thames, which is here of considerable width, and ample depth of water, but affords

fords no great variety of scenery, for near three miles, till we reach Cotterell's Mill and Lock, which objects, though humble in themselves, yet constitute a very picturesque scene, highly deserving observation.

THE village of Wargrave, appearing at a small distance, has acquired much celebrity by the residence of Lord Barrymore. The dwelling, which is situated on a lawn, close to the river side, though but an insignificant cottage, has, from its innumerable visitors, given rise to no inconsiderable expence.

THE theatre, of which so much has been said, is just rebuilt, at an expence of about six thousand pounds, and is, in point of size, I think, larger than that of the Haymarket. It has every accommodation of a royal theatre, with the addition of one elegant apartment, which is used as a supper-room.

THE present rage for theatrical exhibitions, and imaginary scenes of human woe, it is much to be feared has produced many a real scene of distress, towards the last act, that has been incompatible with the strictness of dramatic law, having neither poetical nor moral justness in the denouement of the plot.

FROM Wargrave a beautiful range of hills extends to General Conway's, at Park Place, near which a large house has been recently built, by Mr. Hill, commanding a very extensive view of Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, &c. The river winding beneath this noble eminence, affords new beauties of the soft and elegant in picturesque landscape. The house of Lady Taylor, on the Oxfordshire side of the river, is enviably situated, and comprises a full view of General Conway's grounds, to which you enter beneath a spacious arch of rustic stone work, happily suited

suited to the noble scenery which presents itself within, where the verdant swelling lawn meeting the eye, forms an immense amphitheatre, surrounded with rich shrubbery, from whence, by an easy ascent, we are led to a grand colonnade, representing a Roman aqueduct, falling into decay, and majestic even in ruins. Its decorations of busts and ornaments are judiciously adapted to their situation. A winding subterraneous passage leads on to the menagerie, which contains a beautiful selection of the feathered race; among which the East India cyrus, considerably larger than the crane, the silver pencilled pheasant, from China, with black breast and red legs, and the elegant plumage of the gold pheasant, appeared to be most worthy of admiration.

THE various and extensive views from the different points, in traversing this park, are so

so happily and richly diversified, as to surpass description. On a well chosen eminence, the right honourable possessor of this beautiful spot, has, at a great expence, erected an ancient Druids temple, which was presented to him by the inhabitants of the island of Jersey, in 1785, as a testimony of the respect and veneration due to his vigilance as a governor, and his amiable qualities as a man. The following lines, which were transmitted with this venerable pile of antiquity, will best speak the sentiments of the inhabitants on the occasion—

“ Cet ancien Temple des Druides, “ Decouvert le 12 Aout 1785,
 “ Sur la Montagne de St. Helier
 “ Dans l’île de Jersey,
 “ A été présenté par les habitans,
 “ A son Excellence le General Conway, leur Gouverneur.
 “ Pour des Siecles caché, aux regard des mortels,
 “ Cet ancien monument,, ces pierres, ces autels, “ Où

- “ Où le sang des humains offert en sacrifice, “ Ruissela, pour des Dieux qu'en faisoit le caprice ;
 “ Ce monument sans prix par son antiquité,
 “ Temoignera pour nous à la postérité ;
 “ Que dans tous les dangers Césaire eut un père
 “ Et redira, Conway, aux siècles à venir “ Qu'en vertu du respect dû à ce souvenir “ Elle te fit ce don, acquis à ta vaillance
 “ Comme un juste tribut de sa reconnaissance.”

THE stones which compose this temple, are forty-five in number, and were all so carefully marked when taken down, as to be with ease restored to their original form, when brought to this spot. The circumference of the temple is sixty-six feet ; its height upwards of seven. Within this building, in its original situation in the isle of Jersey, were found two medals, one of the Emperor Claudius, the other so obliterated by time, as to be unintelligible. For a more minute account of this antiquity, I refer the curious to the 8th vol. of the Archæologia ;
 and

and for a sketch of it, as it now stands, to the end of this section.

HAVING traversed these charming grounds in which the hand of nature has been so peculiarly luxuriant, we were highly gratified within the dwelling-house, by a view of the no less excellent productions of art, by the noble Countess of Aylesbury, whose imitations of Cuyp, Rosa de Tivoli, Vandyck, Gainsborough, &c. in needle-work, are little inferior in effect to their originals. They are worked in worsteds, with so much taste, and so happily managed in the various tints, as to deceive at a small distance; one in particular, a portrait from Vandyck, in which the colours are so artfully blended, as to appear across the room a sketch of that great master.

QUITTING the enchanting scenery of Park-place, by an easy descent towards the river-

river-side, the bridge and town of Henley, at the distance of about a mile and a half, present a scene, which, though more confined, is yet happily contrasted with the extensive one we have just quitted.

SECTION XVIII.

THE elegant bridge of Henley consists of five elliptical arches, with a handsome ballustrade of stone-work, and is, in point of simplicity and beauty of design, equal to any structure of the kind on this noble river. It is built from a plan of the late ingenious Mr. Hayward, of Shropshire, who did not live to see the work begun.

ON the key-stone of the center arch, above the bridge, is sculptured a head of ISIS; and on the other side, a venerable head of THAMES; both from the chisel of the accomplished Mrs. Damer, the excellence of whose works is too well known to need any comment.

THIS beautiful bridge was finished in the year 1787, at an expence of near ten thousand pounds. The former one was of wood, but the one prior to that was of stone, and of a very ancient date. Some traces of its piers are yet visible when the water is low. Camden seems doubtful, whether this was the bridge over which, according to Dio, the Romans pursued the Britons, who, he asserts, crossed the river in this neighbourhood.

THE town of Henley is of great antiquity, and by some writers said to be the oldest town in the county; it anciently belonged to the family of the Molins, from whence it came to the Hungerfords, by whose means, in the reign of Henry VI. a licence was obtained for two annual fairs; at present it has four. Little remains in this town, worthy the attention of the curious. Its delightful situation on the Thames,

Thames, and the richness of the adjacent country, must ever render it an object to be admired.

A LITTLE below Henley Bridge is Fawley Court, the seat of Mr. Freeman. It is a square brick house, built by Inigo Jones, on which he has bestowed very few of those Italian ornaments that so frequently overload many of his designs. The structure is very plain, and convenience has judiciously taken place of every other consideration. It is altogether a work not unworthy of its great architect. The situation is happily chosen in point of distance from the river, as well as from the town of Henley.

THE mausoleum belonging to the family is at the pleasant village of Fawley, about a mile and a half distant from the house, and is a spot that a man would rather chuse to live in than be buried at.

ABOUT

ABOUT two miles from Fawley Court, is the pleasant village of Hambleton, the church of which contains a beautiful monument in alabaster, erected by the D'Oyley family. It consists of twelve figures, as large as life, executed in so superior a style of sculpture, and so well preserved, as highly to deserve attention. The poetry of the epitaphs has much merit, and, as it records the virtues of a family in this county, of great celebrity, justly claims a place in this work.

“ To the memory of that noble Knight, “ Sir Cope D'Oyley, late Deputy of the “ county of Oxon, &c. heyre of the an“ cient family of the D'Oyley's, in Oxford“ shire; founder of Ofeney and Missenden,
 “ and the castle of Oxford: who put on “ immortality, the 4th of August, 1633.—
 “ Likewise Martha his wife, with five sons
 “ and five daughters.”

UNDER

UNDER the Knight's figure are the following lines :

- “ Ask not of me, who's buried here ?
“ Goe ask the Commons, ask the Sheire.
“ Goe ask the Church, they'll tell thee who,
“ As well as blubber'd eyes can do.
“ Goe ask the Heraulds, ask the poore,
“ Thine ears shall hear enough to ask no more.
“ Then, if thine eyes bedew this sacred urne,
“ Each drop a pearl will turne
“ T' adorn his tombe, or if thou can'st not vent,
“ Thou bring'st more marble to his monument.”

UNDER the Lady's figure follows this exemplary character, which, as the world goes, may be thought a little exaggerated :

- “ Wouldst thou, reader, draw to life,
“ The perfect copy of a wife,
“ Read on, and then redeem from shame
“ That lost, that honourable name ;
“ This dust was once in spirit a Jael, “ Rebecca in grace, in heart an Abigail ;
“ In works a Dorcas, to the church a Hanna,
“ And to her spouse Sufanna.
“ Prudently simple, providently wary,
“ To the world a Martha, and to heav'n a Mary.”

IN a fine situation, on the banks of the river, between Henley and Great Marlow, stand the remains of the small abbey of Medenham, rendered famous by a modern convention of monks, whose Abbot was a noble Peer. If we may judge by the old French motto, “Fay ce que voudras,” which is still remaining over their door, the principles of these lay brothers, it may be presumed, were not quite so rigid as those of the monks of La Trappe.

OF the mysteries of this fraternity various accounts have been handed about, probably none of them with authority. The only printed one I have met with is in Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea; where the author’s account of this institution far exceeds that of the Alcoran des Cordeliers, or any other author who has written on the subject of monkish institutions. He describes their tenets in so offensive and disgusting a point

point of view, as to have rendered the recital of them unworthy a place, even in Romance; and, for the honour of human nature, gives us every reason to hope that his description is not founded on truth.

LITTLE remains of the furniture of this pious seminary, but an enormous large cradle of sufficient dimensions to receive the fullest sized friar of that or any other order. The abbey is now occupied by a poor family, who shew this valuable relic.

THIS abbey was founded as early as King John, and was a cell to the Cistercian monks of Wooburn in Bedfordshire. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was made part of the endowment of Buzzleham or Bisham Abbey, in Berkshire. From the return made by the commissioners, at the Dissolution, it appears from its poverty to have been of small import, having only two monks, “who both

“ wants none, woods none, debts none—
 “ bells, &c. worth 2l. 1s. 8d.—the house “ wholly in ruins, and the value of the “ moveable goods only 1l. 3s. 8d.”

THE sketch at the end of this section is a faithful view of the present state of this building.

THE fascinating scenery of this neighbourhood has peculiarly attracted the notice of the clergy of former periods, who, in spite of the thorny and crooked ways, which they have asserted to be the surest road to heaven, have been careful to select some flowery paths for their own private journeying thither; among which ranks Hurley Place, on the opposite side of the river, now in the possession of Mr. Wilcox. It was formerly a monastery under the appellation of Lady Place, and a cell of Benedictine monks to Westminster Abbey, founded by Geoffry de Mandeville, in the reign of William the

Con-

Conqueror, the only remains of which are the Abbey Yard, and some part of a chapel, or perhaps refectory (now stables) of which the arches of the windows, though made of chalk in the Conqueror's reign, are still fresh as if lately built. Some farther slight remains of the convent may likewise be traced. Under the great hall is a vault, in which some bodies, in monkish habits, were discovered not many years ago.

ON the dissolution of the monastery, Hurley became the possession of a family, whose name was Chamberlain, from whence it descended to —— Lovelace, Esq ; whose son went on an expedition with Sir Francis Drake, and with the Spanish gold obtained in that enterprize, built the present house, on the ruins of the ancient convent. The family of Lovelace was ennobled by Charles I. The house is spacious, and built much in the style of King James's Gothic. The hall, as was the fashion of that day, occupies half the space of the house. The grand saloon is decorated in a singular style; in the panels are painted upright landscapes, the leafings of which are executed with a kind of silver lacker. The views appear to be Italian, they are in a bold style, and reputed to be the works of Salvator Rosa, expressly painted for this apartment. His receipt for them is said to be in the hands of Mr. Wilcox; but as that gentleman was from home when I viewed the house, I cannot vouch for the truth of the assertion.

DURING the reign of James II. private meetings of the principal nobility were held in a subterraneous vault beneath this house, for calling in the Prince of Orange. Mr. Wilcox has, at the end of this vault, caused to be written an inscription, which I shall transcribe in his own words :

“ DUST

“ DUST and ashes ! Mortality and vicissitude to all ! Be it remembered, that the “ monastery of Lady Place (of which this “ vault was the burial cavern) was founded
“ at the time of the great Norman revolution,
“ by which revolution the whole state
“ of England was changed.

“ Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta, “ Pulveris exiqui jactu compressa quiescunt.

“ BE it also remembered, that in this “ place, 600 years afterwards, the revolution “ of 1688 was begun. This house was “ then in the possession of Lord Lovelace,
“ by whom private meetings of the nobility “ were assembled in this vault, and, as it is “ said that several consultations for calling
“ in the Prince of Orange, were likewise “ held in this recess, on which account this “ vault was visited by that powerful Prince “ after he had ascended the throne. It was “ visited by General Paoli in 1780, and by “ King

“ King George III. and his Queen, 14th
 “ November, 1785.”

ON the decline of the Lovelace family, the estate came into the possession of the Duke of Marlborough, of whom the mansion-house and woodlands were purchased, by Mrs. Williams,* sister to Dr. Wilcox, late Bishop of Rochester; from whom it devolved to her nephew, the Bishop's son, its present worthy possessor, whose exemplary goodness of heart is an honour to humanity. The situation of this house, were it unincumbered from some of its Gothic walls and out-buildings, would be delightful. It commands a rich prospect of the Buckinghamshire hills and Marlow woods; amidst which, at Harleford, Mr. Clayton, the late member, built

* THIS lady held in one lottery, two fortunate tickets, one of 500l. the other of 20,000l. which enabled her to make this purchase.

the present charming villa, on an easy slope, rising from the margin of the river, which comprises a fine view in each direction, particularly towards Bispham Abbey, now occupied by Mr. Vanfittart, but formerly by Sir John Hoby Mill.

THE site of this abbey was originally granted by Edward VI. to the Hoby family. It is singular, that in its first charter, it was dedicated to our Lord Jesus Christ and the Blessed Virgin, his mother; in the second, to the Blessed Virgin Mary only; and in the time of Richard II. it is styled the Conventual Church of the Holy Trinity. It is rather difficult to account for the propriety of these various dedications; however, after being thus banded about, it at length fell into the hands of Henry VIII. who claiming a right paramount to the blessed saints, seized on it with all its privileges, to his own use and benefit. That Prince often visited

visited this abbey ; and in the possession of the late Sir Joseph Ayloffe was a Masque, printed by Caxton, which was presented to him, on his approach to the abbey, with the Dramatis Personæ of the family there resident. Queen Elizabeth resided some time in this house ; and one large state apartment yet retains the name of the Queen's council-chamber.

IN the church of Bisham is a sumptuous monument erected to the family of the Hobys, worth the attention of the curious. An old woman's story is told of a small sculptured monument in this church, containing two children, which children, Calumny has reported to have been the offspring of Elizabeth ; but we have reason to believe, from her Majesty's general system of politics, in public concerns, that she would have been too good a politician in love, to have erected a monument, avowing herself not

not to have been the character which she was so ambitious to preserve—the virgin Queen. The bones of the founder of this abbey, John Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, are said to have been removed hither, by Maud, his widow, from the abbey of Cirencestre, by a license from Henry V. for that purpose.

SECTION XX.

FROM Bisham Abbey, the town of Marlow, considered as a picturesque object, receives much addition from the New Bridge, which is of wood, and has been recently finished at an expence of about eighteen hundred pounds. It has a remarkable ascent, and forms the best object as a wooden bridge, that I remember to have seen. The ballustrades are painted white, in imitation of stone-work; and the whole scenery contiguous is pleasingly variegated by the rich verdure of the adjacent woods.

BELOW the bridge, the objects combine most happily for the pencil, where the river branches out into two channels, one of which (the water being penned up by the Marlow Lock) causes a perpetual fall into the other stream, just below the bridge, which makes a pleasing, though shallow, cascade.

BETWEEN this lock and Battersea, which is a distance of about fifty miles, in all the deep waters, the lampreys are caught in great plenty in the spring of the year, and are sold to the Dutch as bait for their turbot and other fisheries. In one season, it is said, there have been sold not less than five hundred thousand. The price of the lampreys was forty shillings per thousand ; but the Dutch having lately contracted for an increased quantity, at sixty shillings, it has rendered them so scarce, as to raise the price for our own use to nearly six pounds. The Thames has sometimes furnished upwards of a million of this fish annually.

MARLOW is remarkable for its manufactory of bone-lace, and the great quantities of malt and meal, which are brought hither from

from the neighbouring towns, and conveyed to London by water.

It may not be improper to remark, that in the reign of Elizabeth, about the year 1584, the locks between this and Oxford, from neglect, created much complaint and altercation. At Marlow Lock many lives were lost from the sudden and immense fall of water, and neglect of the millers ; in consequence of which, complaint was made to the Lord Treasurer, in October, 1585, and answered the next day by the persons concerned in locks, weirs, and mills, when it was determined, that all disorders arising from neglect, &c. were to be reformed by the ordinary proceedings of the Queen's Majesty's laws, and not otherwise.

At that period there were seventy locks, twenty-two of which were erected within the last six years ; sixteen flood-gates, and seven weirs : there were then not more than ten

ten or twelve barges went so high as Marlow or Bisham, and in the reign of Edward IV. it appears there were only four. This stream was let at that period for three hundred pounds per annum.

THE scenery of this neighbourhood is truly beautiful: the Quarry Woods extend a considerable distance, and form a noble screen on the Berkshire side of the river. The village of Little Marlow lies about a mile distant; it had formerly a monastery of Benedictine monks, founded earlier than the reign of King John, of which no traces are now remaining.

A LITTLE below this village is Hedfor Wharf; and let me not be censured in the digression, when I lead the reader thence to the small village of St. Giles, Chalfont, in Bucks, a distance of about five miles, in order to mention the name and residence of the immortal Milton. Here, when the plague in 1665 raged in London, this much revered poet took refuge. The house in which he resided, and of which I have preserved the annexed sketch, is now standing, and, in all probability, from its appearance, remains nearly in its original state.

As the biography of great and learned men has been deemed worthy the pens of writers of the first talents, any pictorial illustration of that biography, it is presumed, will not be thought unworthy the attention of the curious. This house was taken for him by Elwood the Quaker, who was recommended as a proper person to read Latin to him, and be his solacer in retirement. Here his companion first saw a complete copy of the divine poem, Paradise Lost, which was finished on this spot: and here, in all probability, the greater part of the Paradise Regained was written; as it is well known that his friend Elwood suggested this idea to him (after reading the first poem) in these words: “Thou hast said a great deal “ on the subject of Paradise Lost, but what “ hast thou to say on Paradise Found?”
of

 To which he made no answer, but sat some time musing, then broke off the discourse, and fell upon an other subject. Some time after, when in London, Milton shewed him the Paradise Regained; and in a pleasant tone of voice said to him, “This is owing “ to you, for you put it into my head, by
 “ the

“ the question you put to me at Chalfont,
 “ which before I had not thought of.”

IN the neighbourhood of this village, it may not be improper to mention Beaconsfield, the residence of another poet of distinguished eminence—the courtly Waller—to whom Fortune had dealt with much more liberality; and to whom, though Nature had given brilliant talents, yet she had certainly been more sparing than with the immortal Milton. As a lyric poet Waller stands unrivalled, and in tenderness of style is justly said to have moved all hearts but hers he meant to move.

“ Yet, what he sung, in his immortal strain,
 “ Tho’ unsuccessful, was not sung in vain :
 “ All, but the nymph that should redress his wrong,
 “ Attend his passion, and approve his song.”

HE died at Beaconsfield, in 1687, at the advanced age of eighty-two, after having consulted Sir Charles Scarborough, on a violent tumour in his legs, which soon ended in his dissolution. One day, asking what that swelling meant; his physician replied, “ Sir, your blood will run no longer :”—on which, according to his biographer, he repeated some lines of Virgil, and went home to die. A handsome monument is erected to his memory, by his son’s executors, on the east side of the church-yard, near the family vault, where an old walnut-tree is yet remaining, at the west end of the monument, carefully enclosed within the iron rails around the tomb ; part of the branches hanging over the spiral pillar that rises from the monument, has a pleasing effect, and happily illustrates the rebus alluded to in the family arms, which is a walnut-leaf. The Latin inscription on the monument is by Rymer.

A SHORT ride from hence to the seat of the Duke of Portland, at Bulstrode, will amply

amplyre pay the attention of the connoisseur, where he will meet with a selection of pictures by the best masters, worthy the mansion of their liberal and noble possessor.

RESUMING the subject—the river from Hedfor Wharf, winds beautifully beneath the range of Cliefden Hills, commanding a distant view of Lord Boston's and Cliefden House, which are both so happily situated on an eminence, as to comprise, though not one of the most extensive, yet one of the most richly diversified scenes in the kingdom.

THE terrace before Cliefden House is reported to be higher than that of Windsor Castle. Cliefden House, was begun by George Villiers the second Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Charles II. and is evidently copied from the plan of Burleigh on the Hill, the residence of the first Duke, his father, which plan Mr. Walpole tells us was the design of John Thorpe, a folio volume of whose works are in the possession of Lord Warwick.

OF George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the following lines of Pope, as they are applicable to the present subject, and to the dissipated scene exhibited on this spot, justly claim recital.

- “ On once a flock bed, but repair’d with straw,
- “ With tape-tied curtains, never meant to draw ;
- “ The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
- “ Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
- “ Great Villiers lies—alas ! how chang’d from him,
- “ That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim !
- “ Gallant and gay, in Cliefden’s proud alcove,
- “ The bow’r, of wanton Shrewsbury and love.”

THE last line alludes to an intrigue between the Countess of Shrewsbury and the Duke of Buckingham, which occasioned a rencontre between the Duke and her husband, in which the latter was slain. It is said, that
the

the Countess, disguised as a page, held the Duke's horse during the combat, and afterwards slept with him in the shirt stained with her husband's blood.

AFTER the death of the Duke, which happened in 1688, in the 60th year of his age, the Earl of Orkney made considerable improvements in this house, as did Frederic, the late Prince of Wales, who resided many years on this charming spot. It is now in the possession of the Earl Inchiquin, and is occupied by his daughter the Countess of Orkney.

NEAR the beautiful village of Cookham, on a large ait, Sir Geore Young has lately finished a handsome house, intended, I am informed, for his constant residence : delightful as the situation may prove in the summer months, the winds and floods, it is to be feared, will render it uncomfortable in the winter season.

A LITTLE below this house, at the foot of Cliefden Wood, rises Cliefden spring, which by an easy descent forms a small, yet beautiful cascade, that gently murmuring over its gravelly bed, empties itself into the river Thames. To this charming retreat, (by permission of the Earl of Inchiquin, to whom it belongs) social parties frequently repair to take their repast beneath its cooling shade. In one of these convivial meetings the following lines were given by the author of this work as an impromptu on the spot; let the occasion plead their apology.

Secure from summer's sultry ray.

Haste hither swains, and with you bring

Your lasses debonnaire and gay,

To taste of Cliefden's cooling spring.

Here bow'ring shades to love invite
And realize the poet's dream ;
Here Thames allures the ravish'd fight,
While murm'ring glides cool Cliefden's stream.

Gay Ovid of his nymphs may write
With quill fresh pluck'd from fancy's wing,
Yet here from nature I'll indite
The charms of Cliefden's cooling spring.

Let Horace too his nectar boast,
And be the juicy grape his theme,
Yet here in bev'rage cool I'll toast
The nymph of Cliefden's cooling stream.

Nor will I scorn young Bacchus' aid,
While she is here for whom I sing ;
He shall beneath this fragrant shade
Infuse his grape in Cliefden's spring,

If here the figh of love prevails,
The dart of envy finds no sting ;
Old Thames will smile, and tell no tales
Of what is done at Cliefden's spring,

BETWEEN Cliefden and Taplow is Boulter's Lock, which is the last on the Thames, and the twenty second from Gloucestershire. Taplow Woods join those of Cliefden, and continue near two miles in beautiful gradation towards Taplow House, occupied by the Earl of Inchiquin, in whose park, on a beautiful eminence, stands a venerable oak, said to have been planted by Queen Elizabeth, when in confinement here. But I rather suspect it must have been at that period of sufficient growth to have afforded ample shade to her Majesty, in her noon-tide walks, which could not have been the case had she planted it herself.

It is the noble remains of a very aged tree,

——“ Whose antique root peeps out

“ Upon the brook that brawls along this wood.”

The beautiful irregularity of its majestic limbs and foilages would form a grand study
for

for a painter. The ravages which time has made on this once sturdy oak, have been relieved with extraordinary care, by large sheets of lead, which are nailed over the decayed parts. The spot on which it stands is happily chosen to solace the "mind diseased," amidst the miseries of confinement.
